National Association Attacks Censorship

MEETINGS IN NEW YORK—MANY PROMINENT FILM MEN SPEAK

TO stand together and to fight censorship, in any form, to its extermination was the attitude of the directors of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry expressed at a meeting held at their headquarters in the Times Building, New York, on September 21 and 22.

The meeting was presided over by President William A. Brady and the first order of business was the discussion of the problem of censorship. Those who were inclined to favor Federal regulation were first heard. Several spoke on the subject, giving it as their opinion that a national censorship would protect the industry against state and local laws to regulate pictures. It was asserted as a belief that censorship in some form would probably prevail ultimately and it was better to have it centralized in the national government than to have it scattered among the states and municipalities.

One idea advanced was that if the film people did not oppose Federal censorship and if it became a fact they might be permitted to offer suggestions as to the regulation of pictures.

Federal Instead of State Censorship

One speaker said that he had no liking for the principle of censorship; indeed, was keenly against it, and cited the unwise and unfair methods employed by censorial bodies at different times. He maintained, however, that it was necessary to set about getting the best ultimate result. It was his contention that regulation rather than censorship was the better word, and that the idea of supporting Federal regulation was that a disposition had been found among the people in general—not the reformers, but the people of ordinary sort—in favor of it. The police power, he said, should be, but was not sufficient. That a further development of local censorship would be a terrible embarrassment. If carried out it would mean that the day of pictures other than educational in character would practically be ended.

"If," he said, "Federal regulation is enacted it seems clear that those who want protection, having had it, will not continue to agitate for state or local censorship. It seems the only way to avoid the awful difficulty that such censorship would bring to the industry."

Griffith Condemns Censorship

The opponents of Federal or any other sort of regulation were then given the floor. The most sensational speech of the day came from David Wark Griffith, who affirmed that he was inalterably opposed to censorship in any way, shape or form.

Do we know what censorship means? Five hundred years before Christ, ideas were advanced of peace and love to obtain an understanding between humans. The author of this ideal was censored by every religious society. Later came our Savior and it can scarcely be said that his ideas met with general approval. In the middle ages it was the same and so down to the day of Guttenberg. There have always been censors. When somebody said the earth revolved, it was called an evil. Later still, the stage was censored. The press in this country did not come into its freedom all at once. During a good many years it was very much censored. Yet, if the press were censored today, we would realize that it meant an autocratic form of government in America.

Once Federal censorship is established, what power can break it? Who will stand a chance of arguing with the United States Government? Who would be able to object, if the censors objected to Mary Pickford smoking a cigarette in the first act?

Seriously I believe that Federal censorship means the end of the motion picture trade as an act, industry and form of speech. Not even the stage or the press could survive as forms of speech under Federal censorship.

If we would use our weapons in fighting what censorship already exists instead of seeking to impose more burdens on ourselves, we would be doing the logical thing. There has been no concentrated effort to fight the evil, with the people behind the movement. Why not try that first and then, if necessary go after Federal censorship? Personally, I shall devote my time, in that event, to chasing the sharks that have been infesting your shores. In California we have fought and defeated censorship. Why not fight it here on those lines instead of putting ourselves in a position where we will be hanged before we have committed a crime?

Griffith Wires President Freuler

The serious and sincere stand which Mr. Griffith takes in this matter is shown by the telegram which he sent to John R. Freuler, President of the Mutual Film Corporation, in regard to this restriction of the films.

A great crisis confronts motion picture industry through secret effort that has been carried on by minority of producers for federal censorship law among the membership of National Association of Motion Picture Industry. Special meetings are being pushed through to railroad an endorsement which can be presented at Washington as representative of desires of entire industry. We know from investigation that action is not representative and that whatever has been done favoring a federal bill has been acceded to thoughtlessly at behest of this active minority. You must realize with me that federal censorship will not do away with state censorship. We know from our personal dealings with state and city boards these past two years that each resents suggestion of interference from any board outside their own locality. They will not let Washington think for them. As a matter of law it is not true that federal censorship will do away with state censorship, for it is the constitutional right of every state to retain this power of censorship even if a federal board is established so that effect of latter is only to double tax and to establish a censorship from which, unlike state censorship, there can be no appeal. I believe firmly that federal censorship will mean eventual strangulation of the motion picture industry. The final meeting of National Association will be held tomorrow night and if your convictions permit a wire from you would be of great value.

Freuler Strongly Opposes Restriction

President Freuler showed very clearly the stand which he takes in this matter of censorship in the answer which he sent to Mr. Griffith, and which he requested be given publicity at the meeting if it would aid in the fight against the restriction.

I consider any effort to represent that the motion picture industry favors censorship in any form, guise or color is nothing less than incendiarism and treason.

I want to go on record now with the declaration that the Mutual Film Corporation and the other film interests which I represent will never at any time, under any conditions, submit to or participate in any proposal to accept censorship in any form. We are fighting and will continue to fight every form of censorship existing or contemplated, city, state or federal.

Any man or any interests which suggest acceptance of federal censorship as a lesser of evils is guilty of suicidal error and ignorance.

Any film man who stands for such a policy should not be in the motion picture industry and will not be for long.

Acceptance of any form of censorship would mean the violation of the primary principles of Americanism, and a surrender of our right to do business. If there should be censorship, then there should be no pictures. Our rights and those of the free press are equal and identical.

The Mutual Film Corporation and its allied interests will not be associated in any relation with any organization which stands for or proposes any compromise on the censorship issue. We shall fight to the everlasting finish for our principle.

Further there is no possible value, even temporarily, in acceptance of federal censorship as a foil against state censorship, since it is established beyond question, just as you point out, that the states would still retain whatever censorship power they may have.

Ochs Shows Exhibitors' Standpoint

Lee A. Ochs called attention to the fight made by the exhibitors in defeating Senator Cristman for renomination because he had sponsored a censorship bill. He said that censorship existing in some states was in existence because of personal reasons.

"The exhibitor," said Mr. Ochs, "is the best judge of who should be the censors, because he comes in direct contact with the people. If we show indecent pictures we suffer for it by loss of patronage. Ninety per cent of the people, I believe, do not want censorship."

Seabury Gives Legal Aspect

William M. Seabury, counsel of the association, agreed with the other speakers in their attitude toward censorship and gave the legal aspect of the case.

Any one favoring censorship does so presumably on the basis of expediency. They are opposed to it, but believe they must have something of the sort, so they would jump in the lap of Federal censorship on the theory that this will do away with state and local censorship. This is erroneous. Censorship begets censorship. The more you get the more you'll have. If you have Federal regulation of censorship you will not stop having local censorship. You will get nowhere by such a method. Many people if asked casually whether pictures should be censored, would perhaps say offhand, "Oh, yes." But let the people know what it means and the vast majority would oppose it.

Zukor Changes His Opinion

Last year Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players-Lasky Company, led in the fight of the Paramount Pictures Corporation in favor of a Federal censorship bill, but this year he voted with those opposing this movement. In explaining his change of opinion Mr. Zukor said:

I had fought for the passage of a Federal bill, because I believed that by its enactment, motion picture producers and exhibitors could conform with one set of rules, instead of being subjected to varying restrictions of the number of state and local boards that now exist. It was my conviction that if the Government maintained a board it would have the respect and confidence of the local boards, in time eliminating them entirely. Such a result would be far more desirable than the existence of many boards, as a single standard would enable producers easily to avoid the presentation of objectionable subjects. I am now advised by the legal board of the National Association, however, that the creation of a Federal board would not eliminate the state and municipal boards and would in fact encourage such local bodies in places where they are not now maintained, because of the love of home rule inherent in every state and municipality. Under the circumstances, I intend to be guided by this legal advice, and will fight the enactment of the Federal board as hard as I have fought until now for its passage.

League Holds Session

On the day before the general committee met a meeting was held of the national executive committee of the Exhibitors' League, and at that time a motion was made by Alfred Hamburger of Chicago as follows:

That the National Executive Committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America hereby go on record as instructing their directors in the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry that they are to vote against any form of legalized censorship, as per resolution adopted at the National Convention held in Chicago in July, and furthermore the motion picture exhibitors go on record to the effect that they demand clean pictures from the manufacturers, thereby eliminating the necessity of having any form of censorship.

D. W. Griffith was also present at this meeting and spoke to the members present on the question of censorship, on which he insisted there should be no compromise.

Routine Work of the Association

After the censorship question had been thoroughly discussed the rest of the business to come before the directors was enacted. This was mostly routine work such as the schedules of fees, and dues, and so forth. A number of requests have been received from various political candidates asking aid in their campaigns from the association and expressing their intention of supporting the interests of the motion picture industry if elected. Lee A. Ochs was appointed chairman of a campaign committee to consider these requests.

Those Present at Meeting

Those attending the meeting and the companies represented were as follows:

Chicago Theaters Damaged by Bombs

MYSTERIOUS LABOR UNION TROUBLES ALLEGED CAUSE

SEVERAL Chicago motion picture theaters have, within the last few weeks, been the victims of "bomb throwers," and in two cases serious damage was averted only by a narrow margin.

The last and boldest work of the bomb makers resulted on the morning of September 25 in an explosion at the Orpheum Theater, a large Jones, Linick & Schaefer house located in the heart of Chicago's downtown district. Had the culprits been more skillful in the placing of their bomb serious damage would have resulted. The blowing up of the Strand Theater on Division street on September 21 is thought to have been attempted by the same men. At the Strand a portion of the rear wall was destroyed and the big $10,000 organ was damaged. It was only by a chance that the house did not suffer greater damage.

Owing to these and other less serious attacks on picture houses, it is expected that some combined action will be decided upon at the next meeting of the Illinois branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

The bomb which exploded at the Orpheum, from the best information obtainable, was made of black powder and placed in a tin can. A time fuse was attached and placed at the stage door about 15 feet from the pavement. Its destructive power was slight, but it frightened the inhabitants of the entire section. The reverberation and the consequent air compression shattered windows on either side of the alley and covered the pavement with glass. The heavy corrugated door leading to the stage of the theater was blown to pieces and torn from its hinges. In addition to this a wooden and a screen door were destroyed. A few of the pipes in the organ were slightly damaged but they were quickly repaired and the theater opened at the usual hour, running without any drop in the usual attendance.

These outrages seem to be part of the program connected with the labor war now being waged between two local unions. Getting any definite information from the people who might be able to throw some light on the subject is as difficult as locating Villa among the Mexican mountains. The few exhibitors who dare to venture opinions refuse to be quoted for fear of having the bomb throwers call at their houses. Both George Moore, manager at the Orpheum Theater, and Ralph Kettering, in charge of publicity and advertising for Jones, Linick & Schaefer, owners of the theater, can assign no reason for this entirely unwarranted attack on their house. Both of these men illustrated the injustice of the attack on the firm, which has always been a good friend of the unions.

When the motion picture operators a few years ago desired to organize a union to look after their interests, Jones, Linick & Schaefer donated $50 to help along the infant organization and encouraged all their stage hands and operators to join it. This operators' organization is what is known today as Local 110, of which Morey Cohen, city examiner, is president. This is the local against which the war is being waged.

Local 157, consisting almost entirely of electrical workers, was organized about a year and one-half ago. Peter Cuniff is business manager of this local, and is now said to be under indictment, having been caught carrying dynamite in his pockets.

Difficulties Between Unions

The difficulties between the two locals apparently hinges on the question as to which organization the stage hands should rightfully belong, and to which the operators should belong. Local 157 is an independent organization, not a member of the American Federation of Labor, while Local 110, the operators' union, is a branch of the big body. Local 157 maintains that the operators are electrical workers and should belong to their local. Members of 110 insist that their work is different from that of electricians. Their scale of wages is different, working conditions are different, and the electrical workers' local has no federation charter. The theater owners who have had their houses attacked in the past few weeks intend to learn the identity of the individual or individuals responsible and will spare no expense in reaching this end.

Director Reginald Barker, of the Ince-Triangle forces, established a new record for speed in production when he filmed in one week 63 scenes for the Triangle play by C. Gardner Sullivan, in which Thomas H. Ince will present Clara Williams as star. The scenes are those of warfare and were staged at Inceville. Several hundred persons were engaged before the camra.

"REVIEWS" BY EXHIBITORS

Actual Statements by Theater Men Concerning Their Experiences in Running Feature Films That You Want to Know About

(Editorial Note:—"The trade paper that can give the most accurate information about current features is the paper every exhibitor wants," said a prominent manager recently. In addition to its regular reviews, MOTOGRAPHY will each week hereafter print the actual unvarnished opinions of exhibitors on films they have run in their houses, with the idea of aiding other exhibitors in making up their programs.)

"THE UNWRITTEN LAW" was run at the Bandbox Theater on September 16 and 17 and was again shown at the same house on September 23 and 24.

Manager Miller, at the Boston Theater, speaking about "THE YELLOW MENACE," said: "As a serial it has them all cheated a mile. We have been packing them in all day."

"SAVING THE FAMILY NAME" was shown at the Orpheum on September 21 and Manager Moore expressed himself concerning it as follows: "While it is a fair picture it is nothing for one to lose one's mind about. We have been having a fair crowd all day."

Theda Bara in "HER DOUBLE LIFE" was shown at the Orpheum on September 17. Here is the "inside information" on this picture as George H. Moore hands it out: "This picture is just a bit different from anything else Theda Bara has ever done. Incidentally, it is the best work she has ever done. We played to capacity houses all day long."

Mary Pickford in "CAPRICE" played to enthusiastic crowds at the Castle on September 2. Manager M. J. Weil, expressing himself about the picture, said: "While the photography is poor and the direction amateurish, which can be attributed to the fact that the picture was made over three years ago, it is a money-getting feature on which none of your subscribers can go wrong."

J. Nassau, manager at the Columbia Theater, Indiana Harbor, Indiana, played "CABIRIA" at his house on September 21. When seen the next day his enthusiasm over this picture had no bounds. We tried to remember all he said about it. At any rate the following is part of it: "When you stop to consider that my house seats only 400 people and we took in over $200 with this picture, you can draw your own conclusions. We charged 25 cents and everybody seemed well pleased."

"FANTOMAS," Mutual's foreign-made picture, was played at the Kozy one day last week and George Madison thinks thus: "It's a great picture. It made money for me."

Manager Weil of the Castle advises that he played Lottie Pickford to a capacity house the entire day of September 26, and they paid 15 cents to get in.

Exhibitors Combine Against Exchanges

A delicate situation has come to exist between a number of small theater owners in Chicago and a few exchange managers.

The difficulties originated when the exchanges granted a number of larger theaters situated on one street in Chicago the exclusive rights to show their features only and depended on the smaller houses to show their program pictures only.

This resulted in about ten of the smaller theater owners combining and demanding that they be given an option of showing the features in their theaters if they were expected to show the program. Things were brought to a head when the exchanges refused to accede to their demands and the theater men formed a pact to boycott the productions of these manufacturers by refusing to show anything released on the programs involved in the difficulties. Two out of about fifteen theaters are now showing the features in question and none is showing the program pictures.

Richardson Cotton, an actor with the Essanay Company, was killed by being struck by an automobile driven by Ivan Thorpe at Ephraim, a summer resort near Sturgeon Bay, Wisconsin.

SERIOUS EXHIBITORIAL PROBLEM

Business Plus Beauty

AESTHETIC PERFORMANCES MAKE BALTIMORE'S PARKWAY SUCCESS

The splendid Italian renaissance design of the exterior of the Parkway Theater, in Baltimore.

FROM across seas came the idea for the architectural beauty of the latest addition to Baltimore's picture playhouses—the Parkway Theater.

About three years ago an associate of H. W. Webb, president of the Parkway Theater Company, was visiting England. In the course of his rambles about London, he attended a performance at the celebrated West End Cinema Theater, in Picadilly Circus.

So impressed was he with the architecture of the place that he went to some trouble to secure plans and photographs of the structure, which he immediately forwarded to Mr. Webb. When Mr. Webb received these plans and photographs he, too, was so much impressed that he set about the organization of a company to erect a similar theater in the Southern metropolis—a theater that would produce the best films and cater to the best element in its community.

The location of the Parkway—it is on North avenue a door or so from Charles street—can be compared to, say, Forty-second street and Broadway, New York. North avenue, the principal crosstown thoroughfare in the upper part of the city, was until recent years a quiet, conservative residential section. But the march of progress after the great fire of 1904 decreed that business should not stop at ancient boundaries—and so North avenue, particularly in the neighborhood of Charles street (the thoroughfare that divides the city into east and west) has rapidly become an uptown business center.

Draws Exclusive Clientele

Within walking distance of the most exclusive residential sections, the Parkway has drawn for its clientele upon the cream of Baltimore's population. Its promoters intended that it should be a high-class theater—as far removed from the ordinary conception of a "picture show" as the legitimate stage is far removed from the side-show of the medicine faker. Starting with the physical appearance of the theater itself, no stone has been left unturned to maintain this air of dignity and exclusiveness. That is why, night after night, there can be seen among the audiences there men who are leaders in the city's industrial activities. These men, induced to go to the theater for the first time by their enthusiastic wives, did so in much the spirit that a boy consents to having his face washed. They expected to spend a very bored hour or so watching the "films." They go now without any solicitation—for the management of the playhouse caters to the intellect of its patrons as well as to their emotions and risibilities by showing only the best pictures that filmdom produces.

Chaste Design

A distinctive feature of this picture playhouse, both from an interior and exterior point of view, is its chasteness of design. There is nothing garish; nothing to smite the senses with a feeling of the bizarre. Everything is in good taste, down to the smallest detail. The front of the house is after the Italian renaissance design. It is in simple, dignified light gray terra cotta, with an admixture of light and dark texture brick, the whole giving a charming effect.

At first, as with nearly all motion picture houses, there was fear on the part of the residents of the section in which the Parkway Theater was a pioneer that the street was about to be invaded by a cheap picture house that would attract an undesirable element and send property values down. But as the walls rose and folks began to get an idea of what the place was going to look like, this fear vanished. Today the very people who looked askance at all film productions are among the most ardent supporters of "the theater supreme and distinctive," as the slogan of the owners has it.

So much for external appearances. Inside, the theater might be called egg-shaped, after the lines of its London contemporary, a plan which works out practically in that it presents the screen without distortion to the occupant of every seat in the house, no matter where located. The playhouse proper is reached through a handsome marble lobby, with marble stairs leading from either side to a large lounge and tea room. The lobby as well as the rest of the interior is designed after the fashion of the Louis XIV period. Hanging lamps, reproductions of chandeliers at Versailles and Fontainbleau, add to the charm of the tasteful decorations. The tea room is finished in a delicate French gray, with beautiful old rose hangings, much after the style of the cozy salle or lounge of the aristocratic theaters of Paris, Vienna and London.

The Parkway's auditorium is egg-shaped, with 1,100 deep old rose seats, indirect lighting and real live plants growing on the stage. It is gratifying to know that a theater of such chaste beauty is a commercial success.

The beautiful tea room of the Parkway Theater, finished in delicate French grey with old rose hangings.

On each side of the interior there is a commodious "Royal Box," for use on occasions of ceremony or for special parties. Below are a dozen roomy loges, from which the stage can be seen to excellent advantage. Besides these loges, the first floor contains 800 large, deep-cushioned chairs, upholstered in the prevailing old rose tint with a velour finish, making the seating capacity of the house 1,100 persons.

A $15,000 organ and a large orchestra supply the necessary entertainment for the ear while the eye is engrossed by the scenes projected from an invisible operating room to a screen of radium gold fiber, which brightens the picture and increases its "depth."

One of the most elaborate features of the interior embellishments is the main ceiling, from the large, ornamental dome of which is suspended a strikingly ornamental sunburst. All of the lighting is indirect; there is no glare—in fact, the theater does not seem to be artificially lighted at all, so equally and unobtrusively are the rays distributed.

Of course, the matter of ventilation has been taken care of with the skill and thoroughness that marks the other details. So "fresh" is the air at all times in every part of the theater that potted flowers and plants are kept growing around the orchestra pit, on the stage and at other points.

Children's Matinees Weekly

One of the most successful of the Parkway's innovations is the weekly matinee for children, on Saturday mornings. The critics said it couldn't be done; that the idea of a special performance for children only was impractical and would prove unprofitable. But, shortly after the theater was opened, the plan was tried out. Only carefully selected programs of travel, educational and comedy films, such as "Fanchon the Cricket," "Cinderella," "Making United States Money," "Making Stamps," and pictures of bird and animal life, were presented. With a suddenness that was surprising, the idea took hold in the community, and mothers began sending their children to the performances in much the spirit that they sent them to school or to the music teacher's. The only problem that the management faces today in connection with these Saturday "matinees" is the problem of finding accommodations for the patrons of them.

Open Booking Plan

The pictures presented at the Parkway are booked on the open booking plan. Every film must be seen and approved by the management before it goes before the eyes of the patrons. Nothing in the least suggestive, nothing in the least below the high standard set on the opening day and rigidly adhered to ever since, is even considered for a showing. The programs are run on schedule, and this schedule is advertised so that one may time one's arrival at the theater to accord with the showing of the particular film or films which one desires to see. A weekly program heralding coming attractions is mailed to 5,000 selected names. If one wants information as to price of seats, time of performances and so on, there is a special telephone information department to answer such inquiries promptly and courteously. Automobiles of patrons are checked and guarded by a special officer. Ushers and attendants are well trained and, above all, polite. Prices range from 10 cents to 50 cents. All screen announcements are made in trick film. The theater's own camera man is ever on the alert for local happenings of interest, and within 24 hours after they have occurred big news events of local interest are shown in the screen's Topical Review.

These are some of the reasons for the [illegible] success. Under the active management of Bernard Depkin, Jr.—a very live young man with very progressive ideas and the ability to put them into execution—the patronage is growing steadily. Young Depkin believes that there is something more to a motion picture playhouse than a projecting machine, a screen and tawdry color effects in decoration. To the man who made the Parkway possible the proper presentation of film productions is as aesthetic an undertaking as is the production of the most expensive offering of the so-called legitimate stage. And that the public agrees with this professional point of view is evidenced by the steady clip-clip of the ticket machine in the box office out front at every performance.

That, after all, is the surest criterion of success.

Milo Comedies State Righted

Providing for the Youngster Patron

The Children and Motion Pictures

Under this caption Weekly Film News, the house organ of the John H. Kunsky Theatrical Enterprises, operating eight motion picture theaters in Detroit, Michigan, gives a brief discussion of a responsibility that some reformers are trying to place upon the film manufacturer and exhibitor. The article, which follows, claims that "What shall the children see?" is a question that must be answered in the home.

"An industry that provides high-class entertainment for all the people at a very low price, has been developed to a certain degree of efficiency and usefulness in spite of the fact that it is hampered by the most insidious kinds of interference. If the lowest price of admission to a high-class motion picture theater were fifty cents, and the best seats were sold for two dollars, we would not hear any comment about bad or harmful influence of the productions on the children, and arguments for censorship could not be based upon the children in the audience.

"Motion pictures are entertaining and educating the whole world. Motion pictures bring knowledge, inspiration, relaxation. Motion pictures provide wonderful theatrical entertainment, unlimited in scenic effects, direction, artists, story strength and power. Motion pictures belong to all the people. The low price of admission has not kept the wealthy and dignified people from the theaters; rather, the low price has been the means of drawing all—the rich and the poor—to a common source of knowledge and amusement. But the point that is raising the discussion at the present time is—children—children in the theater.

"For one little dime the very best entertainment can be enjoyed. This is the result of modern invention, capitalization and organization. But, 'one little dime' has caused a peculiar condition to arise—everyone can go to the theaters; and great care must be used in providing an entertainment for an audience comprised of the rich, poor, old, young, male and female.

"The low price of admission to our theaters has made it possible for the man of moderate means to send his children frequently to the neighborhood theaters. Then, too, many children in this age have money in their pockets all the time, so that they go to the theater at their own sweet pleasure.

"'Many of the picture plays,' says the reformer, looking over the theater and observing a few children, 'are too strong for children. They present themes and conditions that the child mind should not be allowed to consider.'

"So, with one form of objection, or another plan of so-called reform, or some other method of regulation—all emanating from busy people who feel that their method of living and their code of morals is a pattern for humanity—with all this agitation and interference, the motion picture business is kept in a constant state of unrest.

"The price lets the children in. And when children are introduced as an argument for interference with this popular, low-priced, high-class amusement, it becomes class legislation, because high-priced burlesque performances and problem plays are not censored, hampered nor molested.

"To meet the objections of these reformers—the same who condemned the pictures entirely in their first stages, ridiculed their development, pooh-poohed the idea of the world's famous artists contributing their ability to the screen, and laughed at the men who invested great sums to build better and more elaborate theaters—to meet the impediment that these people are trying to place in the path of progress, all the film plays must be tempered to the child mind. There must be no big themes, no pictures of real life, no pictorial discussions of the problems that men and women are meeting in this queer world. Instead, the adult, who seeks on the screen some of the stimulation and education that is to be found in our best literature, must sit through film plays of fairyland, nursery stories, harmless western plays, or censored history.

"Of course, the child is to be considered. In a well regulated home the children are put to bed soon after supper, so that the adults may sit together in peace and discuss the subjects that, possibly, could not be discussed before the little ones. These sensible people do not expect to regulate the whole motion picture business so that everything presented in the theaters will be harmless and helpful to their children.

"The children do attend the theaters when, perhaps, it would be better if they did not; but the solution of the problem rests with the parents. The responsibility of child development and training cannot be placed upon the film manufacturer or the exhibitor. The best entertainment is provided for the public at a low admission price. Parents and guardians know what kind of pictures and what kind of plays they want their children to see. It is the parents' duty to choose the child's entertainment, just as the watchful father takes an interest in his child's education, directs his reading, and influences his choice of companions.

"There are a great many of our best photoplays suitable for children. There are a great many subjects filmed especially for children; and some of the theaters conduct a children's matinee every Saturday afternoon. The picture industry has met and is meeting the children's need.

"It is hardly just to penalize an industry that is accomplishing so much for humanity in an educational as well as an entertaining way, simply because capitalization and organization have enabled it to present the best in motion photography at a price within the reach of all."

Motion Pictures and the Parents

The Parent-Teacher Association of Kenosha, Wisconsin, has been making a study of the character of the motion pictures shown in the community and is joining hands with exhibitors in a special effort to provide especially fine films for children and young people. The proprietor of one of the principal theaters in Kenosha has agreed to arrange a carefully selected program for Friday evenings, showing a drama designed for or especially suitable for children, a travelogue, a cartoon and similar films. The members of the association believe that special performances of this kind will remove the objections sometimes made with reference to the effect of motion pictures upon children and are planning to aid the exhibitor by advertising.

these exhibitions. The association is inclined to believe that when pictures not designed for children, showing for instance crime with its consequences, are exhibited it is desirable that exhibitors display a sign reading "No Minors Admitted." Several theaters in Kenosha have acquiesced with the desires of the association in this matter.

D. V. Head, who is chairman of the committee which has charge of the investigation says: "Each individual fits his own standard of morals to the picture he sees, and I do not believe that any clean-minded adult is harmed by a picture depicting immorality. I think they are only disquieted and offended by them. We cannot deprive our children of moving pictures, nor would we wish to do so, for there is much of educational value, much information to be gained and there are many ennobling, uplifting pictures which help to make them wiser and better men and women. Much can be said in favor of motion pictures as home builders by furnishing inexpensive amusement for the whole family, irrespective of age or education, and as the most potent enemy the saloons have to contend with. We love the motion pictures and have no quarrel with many fine plays; we have cause to be very thankful for them. Of course even parents differ upon the kinds of pictures they wish their children to see. Some take their boys to see 'Damaged Goods' for the moral lesson it is supposed to contain, while others believe it is unwise to teach sex hygiene in this way."

New Distribution Plan

It is not always an experienced film man, especially one who has for years carried on a successful sales proposition, turns right around and adopts a film distribution plan that no one thought for a moment would work out satisfactorily. Such, however, is the experience of L. Rosengarten, president of the Herald Film Company of New York, who is releasing the Jules Verne feature, "Around the World in Eighty Days."

Mr. Rosengarten's idea consists of advertising the feature to exhibitors at a flat price, which in this case is $50 per day. Any exhibitor contracting for a week's run is immediately given a first run print. Exhibitors taking the film for less than one week get second, third and fourth runs, depending upon the number of days contracted for. After all the territory in certain sections of the country especially the larger cities has been covered, the film will be sold outright at a figure to conform to the territory to be covered. The advantage in this method is claimed to be the fact that exhibitors in small and medium sized cities can secure the first-run films, which they cannot do under existing methods. The way exhibitors are taking hold speaks well for the future of Mr. Rosengarten's plan.

V. Releases on General

For the week of October 2 Vitagraph contributes five reels to the General Film program. On Monday, October 2, General will release the Vitagraph comedy "Making an Impression." It was directed by Frank Currier. On Friday, October 6, General will release a Vitagraph one-part comedy entitled "A Vampire Out of Work." This is a screaming burlesque on the vampire type of picture and Josephine Earle is featured. As a vamp of all she surveys her dominion over restaurant patrons makes excellent comedy. On October seventh a Broadway Star feature in three parts entitled "Cantrell's Madonna" is scheduled. Gordon Gray and Virginia Hammond are featured. The director of "Cantrell's Madonna" is Thomas R. Mills. This three-part production is entitled to rank with lengthier features because it contains a powerful story and is superbly done.

Walthall in Seven-Act Play

The silence surrounding the activities of Henry B. Walthall at the Essanay studios has been finally broken by President George K. Spoor's announcement that his big star will begin work immediately in a super feature of seven acts. It is "The Truant Soul," by Victor Rousseau, the famous novelist, and is designed to give Mr. Walthall the greatest opportunity of his career for a powerful character portrayal. Approximately 600 scenes will be taken. Only in a few instances will but one camera be used.

Richard Bennett is diligently nearing the close of production of "The Lawmakers," an American-Mutual feature in five acts. This photodrama carries a strong preachment against capital punishment.

What Theater Men Are Doing

AN OPEN FORUM

This is a department of, by and for exhibitors. We want YOU represented here. Other managers and proprietors of picture theaters want to hear YOUR experiences, your opinions and your advice. Write to this department telling us your story, how you started, how you grew and all about your theater and how you manage it. Mention your advertising methods and your lobby displays. If possible send in photographs of yourself and your house. Address, The Forum, Motography, Chicago.

Theaters and Newspaper Hold Contest

A "Trip to Movieland Contest" has been inaugurated by the Photoplay News in conjunction with the motion picture theaters of Rochester, New York. Primarily the contest was started for the purpose of building up a paid subscription for the paper to supplement the free distribution in the theaters, and secondarily to interest the "fans" more directly in the enterprise by offering them a liberal share of the profits.

According to the terms of the contest the city has been divided into four districts and a first, second and third prize will be awarded in each district. The first prizes consist of a three-day visit to New York to inspect the great manufacturing studios of the east. Carfare, hotel bills and all incidental expenses will be paid for the four "fans" who win in the various districts.

The second prizes consist of a visit to the Wharton studio at Ithaca, where the members of the party will be included in one of the films then in the making.

The third prizes are consolations- four gold watches being offered.

The city has been divided into four districts as follows:

District 1 includes patrons of the Regent, Victoria and Clinton theaters; district 2 includes the patrons of the Gordon, Lyndhurst, Lyric, Empress, Aster and Palace theaters; district 3 takes in patrons of the Colonial, Princess, Family and Jefferson theaters, and district four includes patrons of the Knickerbocker, Grand, Murray, Pullman, Park, Lincoln and Ideal theaters.

The contest closes November 15 and the blanks and nomination slips are distributed from the box offices of the various theaters. Subscriptions for six months entitle the subscriber to 200 votes; 1 year subscriptions 500 votes, 2 year subscriptions 1,250 votes, and 3 year subscriptions, 2,000 votes.

A New Pennsylvania House

Rapid progress has been made upon the construction of the new Victor Theater, formerly the Avenue, of McKeesport, Pennsylvania, which has been announced to be opened for personal inspection and business on October 5. The Victor will be one of the finest photoplay houses in the State of Pennsylvania.

The Victor Amusement Company, of which H. A Victor is president, and Isaac Victor, treasurer, has spared no expense to make this theater the crowning triumph of its long career in successfully catering to the entertainment of the better class of McKeesport people.

In their announcement sent out recently to the trade, they stated that they were confident that their new house and the new policy which they will pursue in conducting this playhouse, will undoubtedly meet with the cordial approval and appreciation of their many thousands of friends and patrons in their community, as they are endeavoring to have the structure represent their highest expression of sincere appreciation of the favor and friendship that the public has shown them by their patronage during the past year.

Their plans for the Victor embody the best of all the modern ideas in photoplay construction. They have made careful provision to safeguard the health and insure the comfort and convenience of all their patrons.

The theater management has arranged for the exclusive showing of Paramount Pictures in this district, including the four short reel subjects.

Personal Guarantee for Pictures

By Bruce Goldshaw

Manager Cosmopolitan Theater, Chicago.

There is so much censure of the manager of a motion picture theater from all kinds of people because of the films he shows—some liking one and some another—that I have found the only safe way is to simply put the censoring of pictures up to the people themselves. It is impossible to please everyone, for no two people like the same thing nor look at the same thing in the same way.

As every exhibitor has been bothered, I suppose, I also have had a great deal of trouble with the parents complaining because some of the pictures their children saw were not just what they would have chosen for them to see. I run a special matinee for the kiddies at my theater and that ought to take care of the children, but it does not; they want to come in the evening with the older people and in a great many cases the parents cannot come unless they bring them, therefore I notified the parents that I would indicate in my program whether the picture was suitable for the children to see or not, also when it was a particularly strong play but unobjectionable in every way by putting my personal guarantee to any especially good programs or films.

Therefore after listing the entertainment for certain nights in my program I add a line such as "We cheerfully recommend this performance with our best guarantee," "A feature with a double guarantee," "We are pleased to be able to recommend this offering with our indisputable guarantee," "It carries a double guarantee," "We are pleased to guarantee this as one of the best all-around shows in months," "Another guaranteed attraction," and so forth. When these guarantees are given to an evening's performance the people attending may be perfectly sure not only that they are going to see a better-than-the-ordinary show, but at the same time there will be nothing which could offend the most delicate tastes.

The other pictures which we do not care to guarantee we may praise in some way, but the word "guarantee" will not appear in the recomendation. We may class it as "A very long and attractive show," "One of the most gripping dramas produced by such and such a company," "Biggest show we ever had for the price," or something of that kind, but it does not carry the guarantee. The pink slip plays are of course listed as "No Children Admitted."

With the people who are regular patrons, this classing of the different pictures allows them to be their own censors. If they care to come to a performance which does not carry a guarantee or a double guarantee then they do so on their own responsibility. I have not recommended the pictures for that night as anything out of the ordinary and they cannot blame me if they choose that night to come. With the person who just casually picks up the program, if they see a guarantee by the manager of the performance for the evening they are pretty sure that it is going to be good and are at once tempted to attend.

I have found that this method of standing back of my word and at the same time throwing the responsibility of choosing upon the people themselves has eliminated a great deal of the chronic "kicking" to which every manager is subjected.

Make the First Impression Right

The success or failure of a motion picture theater is governed largely by the first impression made upon the patron when he enters the house. If the first glimpse conveys the impression that the building houses a legitimate business enterprise, if an air of reserve and refinement predominates, if the place looks cozy, —then much has been done toward attracting people to the theater day after day.

Hoyburn Theater, Evanston, Illinois, managed by W. G. Sturdivant.

Manager W. G. Sturdivant of the Hoyburn Theater, Evanston, Illinois, evidently is a staunch believer in the idea contained in the foregoing paragraph. The Hoyburn is located in the business section of the Chicago suburb, seats 635 persons, and the musical apparatus consists of one baby grand piano and one Kimball echo organ. Imbedded in the concrete floor throughout the building are 90 grated air tubes through which one large fan pumps pure, fresh air, on hot days it being iced. Two large exhaust fans draw out the consumed air.

Many exhibitors know nothing about the conscious and sub-conscious appeal to patrons or the value attached to them when used individually or when combined.

Mr. Sturdivant, however, is familiar with their importance. In his eight-page weekly program he continually keeps his truly excellent ventilation system before his patrons, but he has gone further. In his lobby and just outside the auditorium door he has arranged two American flags which flap perceptibly enough in the air current to remind a person entering that the air in the house is continually changing. Of course, you readily appreciate how the average fresh air fiend takes to this. The light colored calcimined walls and ceiling coupled with the indirect lighting system give the place a cleanly appearance, also a very important factor in obtaining and holding patronage. The Hoyburn Theater is only about one and one-half years old and the success it now enjoys can be credited largely to Mr. Sturdivant's brainy magement.

Lo! A New Solomon

A NEW Solomon has been born to us. He runs a motion picture theater, over near the Stock Yards in Chicago, called the "Colleen."

This new Solomon disguises himself under the name of H. Lieberthal. His real identity was revealed one day last week while he and "Sid" Smith, manager of the Kedzie Annex, sitting in the office of the Exhibitors' League of Illinois were carrying on an argument which took its origin from a discussion of the European war.

Mr. Smith evidently has a soft spot in his heart for the Allies and vigorously protested the justice of their cause. H. (Solomon) Lieberthal good naturedly rebuked every attack on the Germans with a wisdom which would have done justice to the original Solomon.

When the fire showed any sign of burning out, M. A. Choynski who was seconding "Sid" Smith would spring some new angle. George Laing, who manages the Burton, would coach H. (Solomon) L., prodding him with some particularly witty remark, and presto, the battle of words and wit was on again.

The climax was reached when someone inquired why Germany had allied herself with the heathen Turks. This hit the "wise one" a glancing blow and here is how he retaliated.

"Heathen Turks nothing! They're all heathens over there! They go to church with a prayer book in one hand and a sword in the other and pray to their God for more money with which to buy guns and powder and then when their neighbor, in the same pew, is not looking they drive their swords through him. If you call that Christianity or anything better than heathenism, I am thankful to be a heathen and a Jew."

Mr. Lieberthal, we remove our hats to you, wishing you all that the original Solomon possessed with the exception of his wives.

Roberta Wilson plays the featured lead in the [illegible] reel Universal drama, "The Emerald Pin."

"For Value Received—Paid" is under [illegible] Universal City by Donald Macdonald.

The "Overproduction" of Pictures

OVERPRODUCTION is an old, old cry, familiar to the executives of all industries. It is always true and always false. No business can produce in consequential volume without assuming responsibility for a seeming overabundance of product. No business has yet brought forth enough of its best to satisfy those who want only the best.

Surely there is an overproduction of automobiles. The figures are running into the millions, and there are only twenty or twenty-five million families in this country. Yet the makers of really good cars are so far behind in their orders that many of them cannot deliver to their customers within weeks or months of the purchase date.

There is a tremendous, wasteful overproduction of short-story manuscript. It comes to the desks of the popular magazine editors in such quantities that they must employ readers to sift it down to a ponderable basis. Yet these same editors are constantly, month after month, hard put to it to find sufficient material to fill their pages.

And of magazines themselves there are more than our population can ever hope to read; hundreds of them that have no place and perform no function, and persist only because their makers live in never-ending hope. Yet here and there we find a single magazine whose copies run into the millions.

The flood of scenario scripts is scarcely less than the flood of stories. Thousands of them pass through the offices of the film companies (and out again) leaving barely enough, or perhaps not enough, to make the pictures that must be made.

Of course there is an overproduction of pictures. It would be a strange business if there were not. No doubt hundreds of pictures are released that do no good for anybody—their makers, exhibitors, or observers—and so might just as well have died in the scenario.

There are companies producing so many pictures a week who would make better pictures if they reduced their output. But that, also, is true in every business. The publisher of a daily paper could make a better weekly with the same staff; the producer of the weekly journal or magazine could make a wonderful monthly with the same amount of labor and application. Almost all of us could perform our duties more thoroughly could we but multiply by three or four the time we spend in doing them.

In all human endeavor there must be grades of excellence. Not all of us can hope to write the best stories or produce the best pictures. However high the standard of average, some will be better and some worse. And always the better will be few and rare, and the worse will be plentiful and common.

Comparisons, said Shakespeare, are odorous; yet we go on comparing, establishing this or that standard by which to judge all things upon which we can vent our passions for comparison. Because there are few masterpieces and many mediocrities, we raise the cry of overproduction. Yet the human race itself is so constituted. For every soul of great character there are thousands of little ones; for every success there are a hundred failures.

Because we make comparisons, there is an overproduction of poor pictures and an under-production of good pictures. Without the good pictures for standards, many of those we now call poor would be good. The overproduction becomes real only when the clamor becomes universal for those few that are very good, and the many less good are neglected.

There is no solution other than evolution for the overproduction of mediocre pictures; for no producer will admit his mediocrity or cut the volume of his product for the altruistic joy of bettering the industry and demonstrating an economic theory. The old, hard law of survival must prevail. If there be actual overproduction in the lower grades, the inexorable progress of business will curtail it. The overabundance of the inadequate cures itself, and is never a menace to the active world. The inadequacy of the best is far more serious.

If there really be any overproduction in the motion picture business, it comes by reason of the extravagances of those who conceive that expense is the key to popularity, and that a picture supplied with high-priced players and expensive settings needs no other element for success. Of such productions there may easily be too many, and continue to be too many until the money is gone and the lesson finally learned. And of pictures that are made as a "buckeye" painter makes paintings, by rote and recipe for the sake of the price per foot, there may also be too many. Yet ultimately the world will discourage these by setting too low a value upon them for profit, and they will pass out of the scheme.

But of the pictures into which the scenario author has put all his imaginative skill, and the director all the enthusiasm of his profession, and the players all the intensity of their art, there is no overproduction. There are not nearly enough of them; and there never will be enough. It is only to be hoped that their over-demand may finally evolve, out of the mediocre, more who are able to rise to the requirements of their production.

San Francisco's Substitute for Censorship

REGULATION of motion pictures in the city of San Francisco, Cal., stands upon a simple ordinance, passed by the Board of Supervisors of that city and county, which declares it unlawful for any person to show improper pictures, and provides penalties for the infraction of that rule. Responsibility for both the ordinance and its strict observance rests with the Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco, whose attorney prepared the bill.

The ordinance is positive and even drastic; but it is wholly reasonable. As a common-sense substitute for an inane censorship it deserves the attention of all communities that are actuated by the desire to be just and sane. Its entire adequacy to deal with any situation must be apparent even to the advocates of censorship.

San Francisco's new law is not the act of a community unfamiliar with the possibilities of censorship. The California metropolis has had its censorial experience. Its Board of Supervisors has had before it in the last eight months all manner of censor bills and suggestions, and has given them full meed of consideration. Its advocates of full and arbitrary censorships are no whit less active or less importunate than are those who are allowed to outrage the governing functions of eastern cities and states.

Credit is due the Film Exchange Board of San Francisco for the indefatigable effort that resulted in the acceptance of this simple and sensible solution for what all communities persist in regarding as a problem. Credit is due the Board of Supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco for passing, by a vote of fourteen to three, the ordinance as it was presented, against the determined and active opposition of the censorship advocates.

Hereafter, San Francisco's film men will be subjected only to their own censorship. That they will be faithful to the trust which the ordinance automatically reposes in them we cannot question. The Exchange Board of Trade, indeed, has definitely committed itself to the observance of the subject and letter of the new law, and will use the power of its organization in maintaining that condition within the jurisdiction of the rule.

It cannot but be obvious to both film men and governing authorities that by proper ordinance or statute the motion picture can be more efficiently and more satisfactorily regulated than by any manner of pre-publicity censorship. Law, in whatever form it appears, we all recognize and respect. Censorship is never law, and by its very nature breeds disrespect and evasion. The most moral and upright of men can count it no crime to beat a censor board—and perhaps a bit of credit.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

THE Parent-Teacher Association of Portland, Oregon, has introduced into the city council an ordinance prohibiting children under a specified age from attending regular performances at motion picture theaters. Mayor Albee has been approached on the subject and is said to favor an ordinance of this sort.

English's Opera House, Indianapolis, Indiana, has been showing the historical picture "Indiana" for the benefit of the James Whitcomb Riley memorial fund.

The Auditorium Theater of London, Ontario, has been advertising in the newspapers lately for suggestions for a suitable name for this theater. A new ten dollar gold piece is offered as a prize.

The Colonial Theater, Chicago, closed Sunday night with the spectacle "Ramona" and remained closed until Thursday, when it reopened with the Griffith production, "The Birth of a Nation."

San Antonio, Brownsville, Austin and New Braunfels, Texas, are all trying to persuade the Gotham Film Company of New York to locate Gotham City, the $600,000 motion picture city, in their territory.

Portland has a clean slate for the August films reviewed by the Board of Censors. Of 730 motion picture reels viewed during August none was condemned and eliminations were required in only 14 reels.

George E. Luxton, assistant manager of the Rialto Theater Supply Company, of Minneapolis, has been on a week's automobile tour of the southern part of the state during which time he combined business and pleasure.

A kite with an acrobatic dummy attached was used by Jack Thatcher, manager of the Regent Theater, Minneapolis, to advertise "The Spoilers." Mr. Thatcher flew the kite every day during the fair week and it attracted much attention.

Winnie Sheehan, manager of the Fox Film Company, has "gone and done it." He returned from abroad last week accompanied by Mrs. Winnie Sheehan, formerly Kay Laurel, and announced they were married in London several months ago.

King Baggot has been appearing at the Victoria Theater, Rochester, New York, for the last week. The Victoria has a seating capacity of 1,700, 1,100 in the auditorium. A ten-piece orchestra furnishes the music and Jack Farren is the manager.

Superintendent Alexander of the Turon, Wisconsin, schools has arranged for the use of motion pictures in the school work of that city. The local motion picture theater will be secured for at least twice a month for the showing of educational films.

The Kansas City Star, published at Kansas City, Missouri, announces that it will not permit publication of advertisements in its columns of motion pictures that base their appeal in a salacious presentation of sex problems.

Mr. Horosford, manager of the Chateau Theater of Toronto, is running a contest in connection with the showing of the serial "Liberty." Three prizes will be awarded for the best answers sent in in answer to the question "Which episode of 'Liberty' do you consider best and why?"

The Canadian Buffs, one of Toronto's crack regiments, have opened the Venus Theater in order to secure funds for regimental use. The house is being run just the same as any other theater although the admission is only five cents. "Shannon of the Sixth," the big war feature, is at present being shown.

A check for fifty dollars was received by Captain Frank E. Ziegler, commanding Company I, of the Eighth Regiment infantry, at El Paso. This check represented the share of the Dauphin county companies in the fund to provide a motion picture outfit for the Pennsylvania troopers at the Mexican border.

The Concrete Theater, Concrete, Washington, was almost entirely destroyed by fire at 6:30 A. M. on September 14. The fifth chapters of three Pathe serials that were in the theater were also burned, viz., "The Iron Claw," "The Red Circle," and "Neal of the Navy." C. D. Stickney was manager of The Concrete.

The building of a new motion picture theater at Musselburgh, Midlothian, was stopped by order of the Ministry of Munitions on the ground that the work was not considered of national importance. The argument was advanced that the quicker the building was finished the sooner it would be earning money to pay for the war, but this carried no weight with the officials.

San Francisco will have no censors. By a vote of 14 to 3 the bill was killed by the Board of Supervisors in spite of the opposition by representatives of several women's clubs and Andrew Gallagher, member of the board. Superviser Edward Wolfe, formerly state senator, declared that censorship was un-American and wrong in principle.

An ordinance prohibiting children less than 16 years old from attending motion picture theaters except on Friday after school and on Saturday, has been introduced to the city council at Anderson, Indiana. The mayor has abandoned his plan of creating a censorship board and is advocating the new ordinance instead.

Kansas City is having its troubles and the efforts of the motion picture exhibitors to have their operating licenses reduced from $100 a year to $12.50 ended in defeat when the finance committee of the upper house voted to report the ordinance unfavorably. The mayor said: "I have investigated the picture theater licenses of other cities and find that we are below the average at $100."

At one of The Liberty's recent Sunday noon concerts played upon the big Hope-Wurlitzer Orchestra the song, "Memories" was being played. The verse was repeated twice, and then the short chorus was flashed on the curtain, two lines at a time, while it was being heard. The soft, ghostlike reflection on the curtain added effectively to the "memory" atmosphere.

S. O. Siegel, general manager of the Brown Film Service Company of Newark, New Jersey, has acquired from the Unity Sales Corporation the exclusive rights to "The Yellow Menace" serial for northern New Jersey. During the Elks' celebration in Newark Mr. Siegel entered a big seven-passenger "Yellow Menace" automobile in the parade in which Margaret Gale, the heroine of the serial, rode.

The Laemmle Film Service of Des Moines, Iowa, has established a publicity department under the supervision of Charles S. Stevenson, a newspaper and advertising man of Kansas City. Writing of display advertisements, construction of house organs and throwaways, writings of newspaper stories and so forth are a part of the service which exhibitors will receive from this department.

H. A. Sherman, president of the Sherman-Elliott, Inc., gave a private showing of the Selig production "The Crisis" at the Strand Theater, New York, on September 29. This exhibition was for the press, territorial right buyers and a few well known men of the film trade. Mr. Sherman felt very much honored to have Winston Churchill, author of "The Crisis," accept his invitation to watch the picturization of his novel at this private showing.

The outstanding feature of the musical program at the Rialto Theater, New York for the week of September 24, was the first appearance at that theater of A. C. Janpolski, famed for his work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Rialto Orchestra conducted by Hugo Riesenfeld rendered Litoff's "Robespierre" overture; Mme. Jeanne Maubourg of the Metropolitan Opera Company was heard in the "Song of the Blind Girl" from "La Gioconda"; and Helen Hunt of the Metropolitan Opera House ballet offered "The Hunt," an interpretative dance.

When the Mission Theater, Seattle, opened with the pictures of the famous annual round-up at Pendleton, Oregon, the house was all decked for the show. The outside was appropriately decorated, and the door man wore chaps and the other things that go with them, while the girl ushers were dressed as cow girls. The organist was also dressed as a cow boy, and when the shooting scenes were flashed on the screen, he added to the realism by taking one of the revolvers from his hip pocket and firing.

A "box of luscious peaches" were on view at the Rialto in New York last week when the eleven winners of the "Beauty and Brains Contest" conducted by Photoplay Magazine and the World Film Corporation were entertained as the guests of Mr. Rothapfel. These young women were selected from among twenty thousand contestants in all parts of this country and Canada. They were in New York to have their availability as screen stars tested, none of them ever having appeared in motion pictures. Tea was served in Mr. Rothapfel's quarters after the performance.

The downtown theaters in Chicago for the week of September 25 are showing Clara Kimball Young in "The Common Law" at the Studebaker; Tyrone Power in "Where are My Children?" continues at the La Salle; Maurice and Florence Walton in "The Quest of Life," also "American Sports and Pastimes" and "Around the World in Fifteen Minutes" opens the last week of the Cinema Concerts at Orchestra Hall; "The Fall of a Nation" starts an indefinite run at the Fine Arts; and "The Birth of a Nation" returns to the Colonial for a long run.

The New Stillman Theater in Cleveland opened September 30. A unique feature of this theater is the fact that the screen is viewed without obstruction from every seat in the house. Similarly there is not a seat from which the picture appears distorted. This system was worked out by a series of sight lines before seats were placed. The orchestra, according to President E. Mandelbaum, will include twenty-five men, led by Hyman L. Spitalny. A huge organ will be under the direction of James H. Rogers, with three organists. The theater will seat over 2,000, with prices from 15 to 75 cents.

Manager W. H. Smythe of The Strand, Seattle, has recently added a big attraction to his already popular theater, by bringing up from San Francisco Franz Adelmann and his well known Bohemian concert orchestra of eight pieces. Mr. Smythe had a new orchestra pit built for them and they made their first appearance at the matinee Wednesday afternoon, Septermer 13, when they were accorded a very enthusiastic reception. Franz Adelmann, the leader, is well known in Seattle, having played for seven or eight years at the Butler Hotel Grill and at the Rathskellar, and he is becoming more popular now than he was then.

H. E. Smith, manager of the Colonial Theater, Seattle, announces a change in policy. Beginning with October 4 The Colonial will open with "The Shielding Shadow" and Pathe Gold Rooster Plays. Thereafter Pathe pictures will be shown exclusively at The Colonial. Mr. Smith also anounces a bigger advertising campaign than he has heretofore undertaken. He intends to tell the people about "The Shielding Shadow" in all the Seattle papers, on a liberal number of twenty-four sheet stands, and on window cards. In fact he says that he is ging to place this big serial before the public in as big a way as was "The Birth of a Nation."

The "pocket program" of the La Salle Theater, South Bend, Indiana, is an eight page folder of convenient pocket size. Four of the pages are devoted to the programs for the week and the other four contain descriptions of the different features to be shown. Exact information as to the time of starting each show is given. The program is printed in black on white stock and enclosed are inserts printed on red and green stock giving the most important features which have been booked for the theater for the next two months. Altogether it is a very complete and satisfying program, giving all the information and just the information required.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

ARE you slighting your advertising? Do not expect to get the best results if you do not do your part along this line. It is up to every manager to find out the kind of publicity which best suits his needs—do not fail to find out the kind you need. If you do not take enough interest to tell the people what you have to offer you cannot expect them to take enough interest to ask. Advertise as little or as much as you feel that you can afford—but nevertheless advertise.

71—Some of the women in my neighborhood are trying to get me to run a matinee every afternoon or at least three afternoons in the week as well as the evening performances. I do run a Saturday matinee but they say that does not answer the purpose. They claim that in the evening and on Saturday afternoons their husbands are home and the men don't like the motion pictures and so they cannot come as often as they would like to but if I would have matinees through the week they could come all they pleased and still be at home and spend the evenings as their husbands liked. Do you think it would be worth by while to do this? The women are so liable to just have fads this way and then get tired of them.

If the women really want an afternoon performance and say they will attend why don't you try it out and see how it works. Even if only a few have said that they would come these few may be voicing the sentiments of many and I believe you would find this move profitable. There are a great many men who do not care about going to the motion picture theaters in the evening and would be only too glad to stay at home if the women did not drag them out. Also very often in the evening if there are children it means either that one of the family must stay at home with them or they must be taken along, and it ends in no one attending the theater. In the afternoon the children would be in school or could be taken along and so the mothers could enjoy the performance without feeling that anyone else was suffering because of their pleasure. It might be, also, that you would get quite a patronage from the school children as they came from school in the afternoon. At any rate it seems to me that as long as the women have felt the need for something of this kind it is a suggestion worth giving a fair trial. You do not bind yourself to keep it up if the matinees are not well attended or are not paying, but just try it out and see what comes of it. If the women lose their interest after you have been running the matinee for a month or two then simply drop it.

Spread the news of these extra shows through advertising and get the women interested so they will inform their friends and thus form the nucleus of your afternoon patronage. You will find that a matinee very often will increase your night business because if the women see a film which especially appeals to them in the afternoon they will tell their family and friends and the result will be a greater interest in the evening performance.

It is an undisputed fact that the women and children make up a large majority of the attendance of a motion picture theater and for this reason it is well to humor them and cater to them whenever it is feasible, for this will almost always work to the advantage of the theater man. The women may make some rather wild suggestions at times, but the judicious manager knows how to eliminate the poor ones and make use of the worth while ones.

72—I felt very much disgraced last week to have a masher arrested in my theater. Of course I did not know he was a masher when he bought a ticket or I would not have allowed him inside but just the same it has hurt the reputation of my house among a number of the regular patrons and they seem to hold me to blame for it. A young girl came out and said the man was annoying her—and I guess he was getting fresh—so I had him arrested. It was done as quietly as possible and I do not think that any of the people in the theater except those immediately around him knew what had happened but of course the news spread very rapidly and everyone in town knew it in a little while and then the town paper came out with an account of it. I am afraid it is going to hurt my patronage for a while and don't know what to do about it. I don't see how the people can blame me but they do just the same.

I really do not see how you can tell whether a man is a "masher" or not unless you are the seventh son of a seventh son and blessed with second sight, but I suppose at the same time it is only human nature for the patrons of your theater to hold you accountable for all that happens in your house. This is a situation with which it is very hard to cope because you never know when it is going to happen or who will be the culprit. I did not think you were often troubled with this kind of nuisance in a small town. You did just the best thing you could under the circumstances in having the man promptly arrested to serve as an example to all other infringers. When you accomplished this so quietly it is too bad the news had to be given such widespread publicity, but I suppose this is inevitable in a small town where any out-of-the-ordinary happening is food for gossip.

If you could tell by the looks of a man that he was going to prove an objectionable character it would be easy enough to bar him from your house. But this is an impossibility. And I must admit that I do not think all the blame is always on the man's side—although by this statement I am not trying to shield or justify the man—but very often young girls invite attention by their action and then become frightened and say the man is trying to flirt with them. An incident of this kind is very unpleasant and one hates to have it take place in his theater. But as I said before, as far as I can see the manager is helpless. You can do this much, though, in an attempt to stop any future repetitions—instruct your ushers when young girls come in alone or two or three together to try not to seat them next to men. This may be almost an impossibility, but I would follow this policy wherever feasible.

As to the gossip hurting your house, I believe you can counteract this to a certain degree by a brief article in the daily paper. If they published an account of the affair surely they will be generous enough to allow you to use their columns to justify yourself in the eyes of the community. I would write just a very brief statement expressing your regret that the incident occurred in your theater and showing how you do all possible to keep the house strictly high-class but that unpleasant situations like this will now and then creep in. The fact that you had the offender promptly arrested should show that you did all you could to set the matter right and will probably make a like occurrence less liable to take place in your house. If you issue a program it might also be well to put a little note in this simply expressing your regret at the affair. As long as every one knows about and is discussing it this action on your part will not be giving greater publicity to an incident which is better suppressed, but will simply show your attitude in the matter.

I think you will find that any falling off in attendance will only be a temporary matter and a condition that will right itself in a few weeks.

73—Do you think that a printed program which the people can take home with them and keep—if they will—brings enough more patrons to your house as compared with announcement slides thrown on the screen to make up for the difference in cost of the two means of advertising the attractions of your house? It seems to me the people do not ever look at the programs after they take them home, and I doubt if they carry them home very often. And if they care to go to the theater they will go just the same no matter what picture you are going to show.

I certainly do advocate a printed program no matter how simple it is. What you want is to make the people remember on what night you are going to have certain films or players they are particularly desirous of seeing. The announcement slide is all right as far as it goes, but the difficulty is that it does not go far enough. It calls the people's attention to the night when you are going to have something which they would enjoy and they say "We must remember that for Thursday night and be sure and come," but the difficulty is that as soon as they have reached home they cannot remember which night it was they were going to be sure to go. The program which they take home will help them to remember this. They will have it for reference all during the week and by studying it may find two or three other pictures which appeal to them.

If you feel that the people take the printed program at the door of the theater but do not carry it home, then see that it gets to them in their home by mailing it each week. To be sure that they keep it and read it after it enters their home is another matter and you must make your program so attractive that they will want to save it. A mailing list for programs is an invaluable aid to securing attendance. I know many theaters with a capacity of about five hundred people that mail out five to ten thousand programs every week. They do not simply supply the neighborhood but go into all adjacent communities and places from which the theater is easily reached by car lines.

You are mistaken in your idea that the people will come to the theater anyway no matter what you show. That used to be the case but is no longer true. The good old days when the motion picture was a novelty in itself and just to see anything move was a delight, have long since passed away. Now the people have been educated—perhaps they have been too well educated from the exhibitors' standpoint. They no longer are contented with anything, but want only the best and are very discriminating as to what they are willing to brand the best.

Also it used to be the custom for people to attend the theater in their neighborhood and not pay any attention to what other theaters were running. But this also is a thing of the past, for the mailing list system which most theaters employ and the motion picture theater advertisements run in the daily newspapers as well as the growing prevalence of automobiles, all make the people more particular and they do not attend any one theater regularly, but study the programs to see who is showing what they know they will enjoy, and go there even though they do have to take a car to reach it. The theater manager not only has to fight the competition in his own neighborhood but he has to fight wholesale competition from practically every picture house in his town or on his side of the city. The feeling of the people now is that it takes a whole evening anyway to see one performance, so they might just as well take time to go to the theater which has a good show. And this is where the printed program proves invaluable. The people may not be in your theater to see your announcement slides. But if they are "fans" at all they will at least take the time to look over your program if it comes to them in the mail, and if it pleases them it is pretty liable to be saved for future reference. Make it unique or especially attractive in some way so that they will have reason to save it aside from the coming attractions of which they desire to be kept posted. Remember that the person to whom your program goes is probably on the mailing list of three or four theaters in the community—and it is once more the survival of the fittest. This is no game in which you can sit down and wait for your turn. It is always your turn and you want to get in ahead of the next fellow who is ever at your elbow trying to surpass you.

Full Orchestras for "The Crisis"

William N. Selig and H. A. Sherman, president of the Sherman-Elliott, Inc., have completed some unusual plans for the presentation of Selig's "The Crisis." Premier presentations in both New York City and Chicago have been arranged at the best theaters and with the aid of complete orchestras.

"The Crisis" is also to be booked throughout the country only at the best theaters. The play will be handled like a first-class theatrical company and a complete orchestra will accompany each film as will motion picture operators. A wonderfully complete line of publicity material, including posters, heralds, cuts, special press stories, etc., are in course of preparation.

Winston Churchill, who wrote "The Crisis," is expected to visit Chicago during the initial presentation. He has written to Mr. Selig expressing great interest in the drama.

H. A. Sherman, who will give his individual time and attention to "The Crisis," has opened offices at 220 West Forty-second street, New York City, and 58 East Washington street, Chicago.

There is an all-star cast to appear in "The Crisis," including George W. Fawcett, Marshall Neilan, Thomas Santschi, Frank Weed, Will Machin, Nat B. Snyder and Bessie Eyton, Eugenie Besserer, and others. Colin Campbell, who directed "The Spoilers," "The Never-Do-Well," "The Rosary," etc., produced "The Crisis" under the personal supervision of William N. Selig.

When the Los Angeles Harbor Commissioners had the side of a mountain at Catalina Island blown down the explosion was made the basis of a two-reel story of love and conspiracy culminating in a dastardly plot to rend the hero limb from limb by dynamite. Director Henry McRae of the Universal Company produced the story—"The Last Load"—from the scenario by William Parker.

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT

Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

Note—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of Motography, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

Selling The Script

By Will M. Ritchey

THE proof of the scenario is in the selling. After all is said and done, if a photoplay story can be sold, it is a good one. That is the only test by which it should be measured. That does not mean that no poor scripts are sold, but it does mean that if the script has been offered to representative producers, and has been refused, there is something wrong with it which the author must correct before he can hope for wide success.

Do not concern yourself too much with the form of the script, although proper form is almost essential. It is the story, and not its form, which counts. Its form, or manner of presenting it, is merely an aid to easy display.

First in the completed script is the synopsis. This is a condensed summary, varying in length according to the length of the story, but narrating in straight, simple language just what happens in the photoplay. Care must be taken to include everything which is important to the story, and to leave nothing to the imagination of the reader.

Many producers buy synopses only. The plot—the main idea—is all they ask. The detailed action, or "continuity," they feel can be supplied to the best advantage only by their staff writers. But the striving photoplaywright may gain much experience through working out completed scripts, and surely no harm can be done by trying.

Next after the synopsis comes the list of characters. This may be written thus:

CHARACTERS

Donald Mackenzie.....Male Lead
Mary Allen.....Female Lead
John Ames.....Heavy
Mrs. Ames, his mother.....Character

This, of course, has much latitude, depending on the number and importance of the characters in the story. The list of characters should show at a glance the number of players necessary to production of the picture, for large casts are a consideration to be avoided unless the picture is of unusual nature.

Then comes the "scene plot." This is to show the number and kind of scenes in the picture and is a guide not only in actual production, but here again gives an indication of the expense and effort necessary to production. It may be written:

SCENE PLOT

Exterior, country home of simple nature. Nos. 1, 3, 15, 17, 30, 35, 37, 39, 41, 60.
Exterior, country road. Nos. 2, 4, 8, 16, 24, 26.
Interior, living room of country cottage. Nos. 6, 9, 11, 25, 28, 34.
Interior, living room, city apartment. Nos. 12, 14, 32.

Each scene in the photoplay is thus described and numbered. The numbering, naturally, cannot be obtained until the "action plot" has been written, and the scene plot is not compiled until the details of the action have been decided upon.

The "action plot" comes next, and should describe, in sufficient detail, everything which the players are to do. Unless absolutely necessary to the development of the story, however, do not specify some particular "property" or action which may not be available readily, but leave to the director the opportunity to furnish whatever situation may be best according to his experienced judgment. The action should be written about like this:

ACTION PLOT

Scenes

1. Exterior, country home. Iris in—Mary on, sitting on porch, gazing pensively into distance—sees someone coming—happy—waves—then disappointed—holds out arms instinctively, then checks her emotion and tears come to eyes—Iris out.
2. Exterior, country road. John enters—walks slowly along road—sees someone in distance—frowns—pretends not to notice—stops and waves—shakes head in refusal—exits—fade out.

SUBTITLE:

"Man's Love is of His Life a Thing Apart—"

This condensed form of describing action saves words and time. It is much easier than to say: "As the picture opens, Mary is sitting on the porch of her country home, thinking dreamily, when she sees someone coming and is happy at the sight. She waves gladly to the other, but when she learns that the 'someone' is not to join her, she is heartbroken—" and so on.

The most difficult and most important part I have left to the last. This is the title, which is like a showcard placed in a window to attract customers. Little can be said of the selection of a title except that utmost care should be used, and many tried before one is finally chosen.

On the other hand, several successful photoplays have been evolved from striking phrases or names, which have been used as titles. It is all a matter of individual choice.

The methods of selling scripts are many and varied. The established author often deals through an agency, but the beginner will do better to submit his scripts direct to the producer. Do not expect immediate results. Do not be discouraged when one is returned with a rejection slip. Send it again to another company. Keep on sending it until you are convinced that something is wrong with it.

Above all, study the needs of the various producers. If a company is featuring a woman star of the sweet, appealing girlish type, for instance, it would be foolish to send that company a story in which a forceful "vampire" woman is the principal character.

And watch the screen constantly. If a certain photoplay is recognized as a success artistically and practically, go to see that picture two, three or four times, until you know each step in the plot. Each time you see it decide for yourself why each bit of action came at that particular time.

Then be sure that everything you write can bear inspection to the same degree.

Study Motion Picture Publications

By Gilson Willets
Staff Photoplay Writer Selig Company

I WISH to start my second article on the subject of writing photoplays by asserting that it is almost as important to know how to market plots as it is to know how to write them.

A writer will turn out what he thinks is a good motion picture script. Maybe it is a good story. Maybe it is a five-reel comedy of worth. The author sends the story to whom? Why he mails it to a feature film concern that specializes in "vampire" stuff. On the other hand a writer may originate a fine and dandy movie drama which would be purchased by some particular concern but he bundles it up and mails it blithesomely to some motion picture company that specializes in slap-stick film comedy.

Know your market, for the marketing of movie plots is likened to the marketing of magazine stories. You would not send a fiction story to The Boot and Shoe Record nor would you send a technical essay to a magazine specializing in fiction. It is the same with motion pictures. Subscribe for all the motion picture trade journals. One in particular prints the advance stories of the films released by the different motion picture manufacturers. These stories will give you an insight as to the character of plots that are being released.

And these motion picture trade journals should be carefully read for they reflect the policies of the manufacturers, afford names and addresses, and will frequently cause one to become aware of the changes of policy so frequently made by the manufacturers.

In preparing your motion picture plots remember first of all to use the typewriter. Editors will not read scripts written in longhand. Send out your work in a businesslike manner. Use good white paper, long envelopes plainly addressed. On each sheet of your manuscript have your full name and address plainly written. Always enclose a self-addressed and stamped envelope. These details are appreciated by editors and aid in your script being given proper consideration.

There are also many opportunities to sell movie plot ideas by means of synopses. That is details of the plot written clearly and concisely in a few hundred words. These should also be typewritten, should contain no "word paintings" but should relate the plot and nothing else.

Prices paid for motion picture plots vary. Twenty-five dollars is the customary price for synopses. Prices paid per reel vary from thirty-five dollars to one hundred dollars. More money is frequently paid according to reputation of the author and worth of the story.

Board of Censors Cut-Outs

WHAT to avoid in order to escape the censure of the National Board of Censors is a question over which a great many photoplaywrights are puzzling.

Of course the easiest way to avoid complications is to write only plays which could not possibly come under the ban, but this does not seem to be the idea in the minds of most writers. They claim that they cannot get the "punch" and real "heart-interest" into their photoplays unless they border on the sensational.

In their effort to save the manufacturer from having his film badly cut the National Board of Censors issues bulletins pointing out situations to be avoided in the manufacturing of films. It might be well for the writer to have a few of these points brought to his notice, and to keep them on his desk for ready reference when building up his plot.

Some of the most pertinent of these are:

Unnecessary use of liquor—"A great deal of promiscuous drinking is now shown in motion pictures when entirely unnecessary for any dramatic purpose. For example, if two men meet on the street, they dash into a cafe for a drink; in a club room scene, the principal occupation of club members appears to be constant drinking. Advices reaching the National Board's office indicate serious objection to the constant drinking shown in motion pictures. We urge you to eliminate all unnecessary drinking incidents."

Unnecessary use of weapons—The Board "objects to the unnecessary and irrevelant use of revolvers, knives, etc., to portray merely an emotion," and says that it is "undramatic, inartistic and untrue to life."

Rough handling of women—"Such brutality is nearly always overdone. The National Board eliminates the wanton rough handling of women. Producers are urged to avoid it to save your companies the expense of eliminating such incidents with consequent mutilation of the picture."

Cruelty to animals—"In the future the National Board will continue to be watchful for incidents in pictures which indicate that animals have been ill-treated. It will eliminate such scenes as in its opinion would shock the sensibilities of motion picture audiences or appeal to the morbidity of individuals who desire to witness this sort of thing."

"Ne'er-Do-Well" Remains on Vitagraph

So many exhibitors have wondered what would become of the "Ne'er-Do-Well" after the withdrawal of Selig from V-L-S-E. that General Manager Walter W. Irwin has reiterated his statement that the "Ne'er-Do-Well" is not affected by the withdrawal of the Lubin, Selig and Essanay Companies from V-L-S-E. Inc.

Sol Lesser's statement to Mr. Irwin explicitly states that he is entirely satisfied with the efficient way in which his picture has been distributed and it is not his intention to disturb this arrangement in the slightest degree. Exhibitors desiring bookings on the "Ne'er-Do-Well" should get in touch with their local Vitagraph-V-L-S-E. managers.

Franklyn Ritchie and Helene Rosson have just finished work in "Esther of the People," a five-part sociological drama.

Meet Charlie Chaplin in "The Pawn Shop"

MARY MILES MINTER AS SOUTHERN GIRL IN LATEST MUTUAL RELEASE

A certain great and sombre funnyman in his newest play, "The Pawn Shop."

THE sublime and the ridiculous head the Mutual offerings for the week of October 2, in the appearance of Charlie Chaplin in his newest Chaplin-Mutual release entitled "The Pawn Shop," and Mary Miles Minter in her second Mutual Star Production, "Dulcie's Adventure."

In "The Pawn Shop" Charlie appears in his own famous make-up—the feet, the baggy trousers, the moustache and the funny hat. He assumes the role of the under-assistant to the pawnbroker—the man who shines the three balls over the door, dusts the furniture, and does the dishes for the shop-keeper's daughter. Edna Purviance is seen in the role of the pawnbroker's daughter.

In "Dulcie's Adventure" Mary Miles Minter appears in the role of an appealing young southern girl. The picture was directed by James Kirkwood and abounds in the human touches for which his productions are famous. Bessie Banks and Marie Van Tassell have important parts in the characters of the two maiden aunts. Alan Forrest plays opposite Miss Minter, and aside from him there are Mollie Schafer, Perry Banks, John Gough, Harry von Meter, Gertrude Le Brandt, William Carroll and Robert Klein.

On this same program appears a five part Mutual Masterpicture, "A Woman's Daring," featuring Winnifred Greenwood and Edward Coxen, and scheduled for release on October 6. In suport of Miss Greenwood and Mr. Coxen are George Field, the perfect villain, and a well balanced cast.

"The False Magistrate," the fifth "Fantomas" installment, will be released Thursday, October 6. The booking reports on this detective series from the Gaumont studios have surpassed even the most optimistic expectations of the producers. In this, as in the other installments, "Fantomas" escapes at the last moment, and in a wholly unexpected manner, from death at the hands of the law, and from Juve, the world's master detective.

"Arabella's Prince," a Thanhouser two-part drama released October 6, possesses a whimsically humorous turn. Clavering Jones, Jr., a ten-year-old-youngster, has an important part and shares honors with a cat and a parrot.

The Beauty comedy of the week is released as usual on Thursday. Orral Humphrey appears at this time in an amusing farce, the name of which is "Slicking the Slickers." Mr. Humphrey gets out of this funny story his usual amount of eccentric humor.

"A Touch of High Life," a Vogue comedy in two reels, appearing Sunday, October 8, gives Paddy McQuire, the Mutual funny man, unusual situations to his heart's content. In substituting his station in life from street sweeper to gay young sport at a summer resort all in one afternoon, "Paddy" finds himself in deep, but not too deep for him to get out.

The Cub comedies for the week will be three in number. "Oh! For a Cave Man," the first of these, will appear Friday, October 6, and "Won By a Fowl" and "That Wonderful Wife" will both go out on the following day.

The remaining releases for the week consist of the usual scenic and current material of Gaumont production. Mutual Weekly No. 92, the news pictorial, and the split reel scenic-comic "See America First," will go out on Wednesday, October 4. "Reel Life," the Mutual's magazine in pictures, will be released on Sunday, October 8.

Mutual Film History in the Making

At the American Film Company studio at Santa Barbara Mary Miles Minter, Richard Bennett, and the comedians Kolb and Dill, are giving the finishing touches to Mutual Star Productions of five-part length, also a five part western with Frank Borzage and Anna Little in the leading roles is rapidly nearing completion and Orral Humphrey is turning out "Beauty" comedies at a dizzy rate.

"Faith," the feature which is keeping Miss Minter busy, was written by James Kirkwood, her director. The combination of the litle star's acting, and Kirkwood's directing on a play from his own pen is hard to surpass and people at the studio who have watched them working say the picture will be a splendid one.

Richard Bennett is deep in "The Law Makers," which is a preachment against capital punishment. Before leaving New York City Mr. Bennett had a long conference with Warden Thomas Mott Osborne of Sing Sing prison planning the details of this drama. Exact replicas of portions of Sing Sing have been made for the settings of this photoplay.

"Peck O'Pickles" is the comedy which Kolb and Dill are completing. This will be their third funny picture to go out as a Mutual release. A most remarkable bit of comedy is introduced in the ride of the comedians on the back of a whale.

The western picture in which Anna Little and Frank Borzage are working is entitled "Immediate Lee." The story is by Kenneth Clarke, the short story writer.

At the Vogue Studios, Paddy McQuire, Rube Miller and Ben Turpin are more than doing things with a decidedly original turn for funny pictures.

"Paddy's Pet Pup" is the present Paddy McQuire picture in the making. While Paddy has the leading role, the pup will no doubt share the honors with him. The dog is one of the most clever ever used for screen work, and in the story, he is the main instrument in aiding Paddy avert a robbery. In support of Paddy and the pup are Gypsy Abbott and Arthur Moon.

A second two-reel funny picture is being produced by Rube Miller and Ben Turpin with the aid of Lillian Hamilton and a large and competent company.

Its title is "Revenge Is Sweet," and the plot develops backwards in a most astonishing manner. The setting is western and the situations are unique.

George Ovey, the Cub comedian, is still at work turning out funny pictures showing the adventures of Jerry, at the Horsley studios in Los Angeles. Booking reports show a steady increasing demand for this young actor with his style of playing all his own.

New "Pick-up" System Proposed

Motography, in its issue dated September 30, carried an article on the evils connected with the present system of delivery and pick-up of films from the exchanges and theaters.

We are glad to report that some action has been taken toward the improvement of existing conditions and urge all exhibitors to investigate the contract which Charles Levy Film Service Company is offering. The contract is reproduced below.

Charles Levy, the owner of the aforementioned delivery service, has for the past few years been a newspaper and magazine distributor. Among about fifteen magazines of national prominence he distributes the Curtis publications in Chicago and vicinity, he conducts the entire city delivery service of one of the big Chicago morning papers.

Among other things, Mr. Levy proposes to install a $10,000 equipment with which to handle this service; he proposes to put up a bond sufficiently large to cover any losses which might be incurred through the loss of film in transit to and from the exchanges.

Following is the proposed agreement:

AGREEMENT.

Charles Levy Film Service Company, 27 North Fifth Avenue, Chicago.

Gentlemen:

You are hereby authorized to pick up the films every evening after the show at the .....(Name)..... Theater, and deliver these films on time at the various exchanges to which they belong. It is understood that you agree to be responsible for loss by theft after films have been delivered to you, and it is also understood the exchange will not hold me responsible if pick-up is made by your company.

For this service we agree to pay you $2.00 per week for pick-up, or $3.00 per week for combination pick-up and delivery from exchange to theater, payable weekly.

This agreement may be cancelled on thirty days' notice.

Name of Theater.....

Address of Theater.....

Name of Owner or Manager.....

Date..... Chicago, Illinois.

Copies of the above agreement have been left at practically all the exchanges and if you are unable to obtain one there, write or telephone to Motography, Chicago.

One of the charming scenes in the new American-Mutual Mary Miles Minter play, "Dulcie's Adventure," in which Director Kirkwood brings out admirably the "human nature in animals."

Fourth Exhibitors Ball

The fourth annual entertainment and ball of the Cinema Exhibitors' Association of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will be held on November 6, election eve, at Hunt's Point Palace, the Bronx, New York.

There will be a grand march of photoplay stars led by Mme. Olga Petrova and Carlyle Blackwell, and many of the film artists have promised to attend. The following committee is hard at work: Henry Cole, chairman; J. Bolte, H. Pollak, A. Levy, N. Scheinberg, A. Bauernfreund and President J. J. Wittman, ex-officio.

At the last annual ball more than 4,000 were present and the coming affair will be bigger than any of the previous entertainments held by the association as the committee has been assured of the co-operation of the manufacturers and photo-players.

Kolb and Dill in New One

"Peck o' Pickles," the stage success which won fame for Kolb and Dill as German comedians, is now being filmed as a five-act American-Mutual comedy under the direction of Thomas N. Heffron, and personally supervised and to be presented by Samuel S. Hutchinson. Not the least amusing of incidents appearing in "Peck o' Pickles" is a dream ride which Louie and Mike (Kolb and Dill) take on the back of a whale at sea. They dream that they are shipwrecked, and swim to what appears to be a small island, but which proves to be a real, live whale which, tearing through the water with Mike and Louie on its back, spouts water all over the comedians. Mike becomes sea-sick, and when the awakening comes they find themselves in their "blind pig," where a beer keg has burst and they are drenched with beer. There are also a number of other situations just as side-splitting

He Captured "The Crisis"

ABOUT HARRY SHERMAN AND THE BIG THINGS HE'S UP TO

HARRY SHERMAN, of Minneapolis now, of Chicago in the very near future, does not look like a film magnate. He lacks certain prominent features possessed by many men who have made millions in films. He looks and acts more like a good, big, husky, center-rush on a championship football eleven, and it is just like a center-rush that he appears to have gone through the film industry, taking most of the loose money in sight.

Sherman recently purchased from William N. Selig the rights on "The Crisis," considered by Mr. Selig himself to be his masterpiece in film production. There was no quibbling about the matter. Selig said his price for the rights for all of the United States and Canada was $250,000 and Sherman just remarked "You're on." That closed the largest state rights purchase in the film business.

Harry Sherman, the big, husky, good-natured film man who owns Selig's "The Crisis."

And Sherman says he is going to make more money on "The Crisis" than he did on "The Birth of a Nation." He declares he knows how to do it, and he is going to use business methods to make his $250,000 cash purchase show a good, big dividend. He is going to run "The Crisis" just as if it were a production of the legitimate stage on big time. Every print that he sends out will be accompanied by an orchestra and a complete projection outfit, including booths and an expert operator. He says that he will show it in a tent if necessary, so long as he can get the juice to supply the current for the machine.

About Harry Himself

This young plunger of the film business acknowledges having been born in Boston in 1884. Unlike the romance of many successful men, he did not have to walk the streets of Boston during his childhood with unclothed feet. He had shoes and stockings and all that went with them, and also an education; which, with his business experience, he is willing to pit against the kings of the film industry.

He is married, but he says it does not make any difference to the film industry whether he is married or single so long as he is willing to pay cash for what he gets, and he does not believe in making Mrs. Sherman a beauty advertisement for his own business ventures.

Sherman got tired of Boston and its environments many years ago. His entry into the film business is approaching its seventh birthday. About seven years ago he went to Minneapolis, where he started as an exhibitor, and remained in the exhibiting end of the business for two years. He then started an independent exchange. Shortly after starting the independent exchange, he contracted for the Alco program which he controlled in Minnesota, Wisconsin and North and South Dakota.

"Alco quit and I went broke," remarked Sherman in describing this period in his career.

Upon "going broke" he started another independent film exchange and did well with it until he purchased the state rights to "The Birth of a Nation," which he affectionately calls "The Birth."

Sherman purchased the state rights of "The Birth of a Nation" for seventeen states, which took in from Wisconsin to the coast with the exception of California, Missouri and Texas, which were retained by the New York company. It is said on good authority that the state rights for "The Birth of a Nation" cost Sherman and Elliot, his partner, $100,000. On August 1, 1916, the gross income to the Sherman-Elliot Company from "The Birth of a Nation" was $1,360,339. From the time of the purchase, about one year ago, they have been keeping four companies on the road. They are about to put three more on.

In discussing the exhibiting of "The Birth of a Nation," Sherman talks of the film just as if it were a legitimate speaking production. He talks of companies, not prints. He is justly proud of the fact that every print of "The Birth of a Nation" that he has put out really is a company, owing to the fact that he sends with it his own orchestra of from twenty to twenty-five pieces, his expert operator, his press agent ahead, and his business manager with the company, exactly the same as Zeigfield runs his "Follies."

After he purchased "The Birth of a Nation," Sherman got the state rights in the same territory for Helen Hunt Jackson's filmization of "Ramona." The Sherman Company has four prints working continually on "Ramona," and reports receipts of about $5,000 a week.

The purchase of "The Crisis" is the third big film epoch in the life of Sherman. He thoroughly believes that "The Crisis" will be as big a money getter as "The Birth of a Nation." He describes it as the greatest film of American history, and he believes its pulling power cannot be estimated.

"The Crisis" will be exhibited in exactly the same manner as "The Birth of a Nation" and "Ramona." Everything will be absolutely complete for the exhibitor. All that he will have to do will be to see that his house is neat and clean, and at the same time large enough to take care of a good-sized audience. Sherman never has done business on the vacant percentage of a house. He believes that every seat should be filled, and for that reason he wants every seat in condition to be filled.

Will Open Chicago Exchange Soon

Sherman still continues to be a believer in the independent exchange. He says the time is now ripe for an independent exchange man to make money in large quantities, and to show that he believes in his own advice, he is about to open at Chicago the largest independent exchange ever run in the United States. His plan is to release one feature a week from this independent exchange. These features to be sold at such a price that the renting exhibitor may make a handsome profit without increasing his admission price. In the words of Sherman:

We propose running the best films on the market at a price within reach of all. The open booking idea has so permeated, that the time is ripe for a real big independent exchange. I purpose running it. In order to do it right, I am going to move from Minneapolis to Chicago and will open the independent exchange in the latter city.

Sherman is anxious to go into the producing end of the business, but not so anxious to make the change that he is willing to produce pictures at a loss.

If I cannot go into the producing end of the business in competition with the present producers, he declares, I will stay in the state rights and independent film end, and will go after every masterpiece produced. I like the producing end, but I know of the opportunities in the distributing end.

Adopt New Credit Rules

New credit rules, to be effective October 1, were adopted at a regular meeting of the Film Men's Credit Association held in Milwaukee recently. These new rules follow:

Owing to the fact that exhibitors desire to advertise coming atractions with a greater degree of certainty of getting them, the film exchanges being members of this association, agree to arrange their bookings so that booking sheets will be mailed to exhibitors one week in advance. If a cancellation is desired; for example, bookings week of October 16 to 22 cancellation on any day of this week should be in the office of the exchange Monday, October 9.

In order to carry out the spirit of this rule, it will be impossible to accept cancellations for bookings, unless they reach the exchange on the Monday of the week prior to play date; in the case of the above example, Monday, October 9. This will enable the bookers of all exchanges to make use of the most desirable subjects and will prevent the oft-repeated waste of leaving film on the shelves, which many exhibitors would have liked to have in place of what was booked them.

Cancellations reaching the exchange after the specified period will be honored and charge for program will be made as if no cancellation had been received. The members of the Film Men's Credit Association feel that this rule will benefit the showman who attends to his bookings in business-like manner and will work hardship only on the man who carelessly fails to realize that once a film is booked it is not available to anybody but the exhibitor it was intended for. The saving in clerical work alone that will result from the observance of this rule will enable every exchange to give better, more dependable service, entirely aside from the saving it will mean to exhibitors in express charges for paper that will not be used. The members of the association are certain that the progressive elements among the exhibitors will encourage all others to join in this movement, designed to save money and aggravation to everybody concerned.

Film Men's Credit Association.

Billie Burke in New Role

Billie Burke, famous star of the George Kleine motion picture novel "Gloria's Romance," it is whispered, is soon to be cast for a far more important role. Ere the leaves fall from the trees, gossip whispers, the radiant Billie will appear as the leading woman in a drama of life called "Mother." The all-star supporting cast will, of course, include Florenz Ziegfeld, Jr., husband of Billie, and a tiny youngster, name and sex later to be announced. Success is assured, for never was there a happier pair than Billie and Flo, and never a more gorgeous setting for such a drama than "Hastings-On-Hudson," the country home of the Ziegfelds.

With the arrival of a little heir to the Ziegfeld fortunes Billie Burke will have indeed consummated a romance within a romance for it was during the filming of the Rupert Hughes novel "Gloria's Romance" at the George Kleine studios that the secret of the Ziegfelds was first admitted to the world. A host of film fans, friends in the film industry, and associates during the filming of the great George Kleine motion picture novel, will join in the toast: "Here's to you, Baby Ziegfeld; may you be one-half as clever as your famous daddy and one-half as beautiful as your radiant mother!"

Soldier Drew Bara's Face

Theda Bara undoubtedly receives more "mash notes" than any other actress in the world. Periodically, however, the unique William Fox vampire gets a really remarkable letter which contains something more than a pyrotechnical declaration of love, or a Patrick Henry plea for an autograph portrait.

Such a letter came to Miss Bara last week from 191 Indian Grove, in Toronto. Here it is:

This note deals with a coincidence in which you figure as the leading lady. About three years ago, a chum and myself after roaming about for several years found ourselves in Paris. My chum, Tom S—, by name, had a certain talent for drawing, which might have won him notice had he developed it properly. He always carried along with him his crayons and often would pass the time by sketching pictures.

We were in Paris when war was declared, and left there for England, where we enlisted under the Union Jack. The decision to enlist had come as naturally to us as a decision to eat; and on the night we departed from Paris, we too were wrapped in the gloom which spread over the city at the time, and were not in any jovial mood.

That night in our room, Tom drew a face which was at once the most beautiful and most repellent I had even seen. I had never looked on one just like it; yet, somehow, it held more than I can tell. I studied it closely, for it was absolutely out of tone with what he usually drew, and as I studied it, sometimes I could discern wickedness, sometimes gentleness, and sometimes a resemblance to the Madonna.

He watched me as I held the sketch in my hand, then remarked:

"F—, there's the face of a woman that a man would hate, and yet go through the flames of hell to please, and to gain her love."

After a short period in England, we went to the front and at the battle of Givenchy, my chum was killed and I was wounded seriously, and being no longer fit for military service, came home. Now, Miss Bara, judge my astonishment when I saw flashed on the screen in a picture theater here not long ago, the face that my friend had drawn. After inquiry, I found that it was you.

I am positive that my chum had never seen you on the screen, or in the flesh, else he would have remarked it at the time he made the head, yet every feature of face was identical with that which he drew. I should like to send you that sketch now, but God only knows where it is.

Little Bugs That Bite 'Em

A genuine "bug" feature is under construction at the Fine Arts studio with Director Paul Powell producing. The characters of the feature are "bugs" on various fads and ailments; a collection of regular bugs is used and, at the climax, the "little bugs that bite 'em" are revealed in microscopic motion pictures to solve one of the biggest screen mysteries of the year. The microscopic work is being done at the Lewis H. Tolhurst laboratories, Mr. Tolhurst and W. E. Wing, author of the "bug" photoplay, being authorities in scientific microscopic screen work.

Above Miss Florence LaBadie sends her very latest view to you, and on the other side is Jane Grey, another featured Pathe personage. All the goings on in the center picture are to induce that dog-goned lucky pup to stay awake and act. He was insured for $5,000 during the filming of the play and ran away six times. Gladys Hulette is the lady pirate in this story, "Prudence, the Pirate," which will be ready October 22.

Gold Rooster a Week for Pathe

ASTRA, ARROW, BALBOA AND THANHOUSER TO GIVE THEIR BEST EFFORTS

PATHE has further strengthened its program by the announcement that after October 8 one Gold Rooster will be released each week. The features for this program will be furnished by the Astra Film Corporation, Arrow Film Corporation, Balboa, Thanhouser and the best the open market affords. This latest increase in program is in accordance with the policy of gradual expansion laid down by J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager, last spring.

Each of Pathe's producing companies are in friendly competition to produce only the best and their resources prove that they have ample ability to make quality pictures.

The Astra Film Corporation has at its disposal the financial resources of Pathe and the facilities of the Pathe Jersey City studios. Louis J. Gasnier, a production expert is president; George B. Seitz, the secretary and treasurer is author of many features and serials, among them "The Iron Claw." The stars are chosen without regard to expense but in consideration only of their ability to play the particular part. Among the Astra directors are George Fitzmaurice; Eduard Jose, who made "The Iron Claw" and is now making the army serial "Pearl of the Army"; and Donald Mackenzie, producer with Louis J. Gasnier of "The Perils of Pauline."

W. E. Shallenberger, president of the Arrow Film Corporation, is one of the progressive men of the industry. He was long interested in the Reliance-Mutual studios and was largely responsible for "The Million Dollar Mystery." Mr. Shallenberger states that men with wide business experience are back of the corporation and they plan to make only the best features. They now have under contract well-known stars and directors and their scenarios will be prepared from famous stage and literary successes and from original stories by the very best authors.

From the Balboa Film Company will come six features with Baby Marie Osborne. The first of these, "Little Mary Sunshine," has been booked and rebooked from coast to coast and the second one will be released November 12. Balboa has completed the fourteen episode, "Grip of Evil" picture, and is now engaged in making another big serial for Pathe. "Sultana," a Balboa production with Ruth Roland, has been Pathe-colored and will be released October 29.

The first two Thanhouser releases were "The Fugitive" and "The Shine Girl." Mr. Thanhouser is giving his personal attention to each Gold Rooster he makes for Pathe and has promised that future releases will be of the same high order of merit.

Arrow Adapts Hall Caine's Novel

"The Bishop's Son" will be the first of a series of special seven and eight-reel productions to be made by the Arrow Company. This is based on Hall Caine's novel "The Deemster" and on Mr. Caine's own dramatic version of "The Deemster" which his son Derwent Hall Caine produced and played in on the English stage under the title of "The Bishop's Carriage." To add to the value of the production Derwent Hall Caine will play the same role in the film version that he made famous on the stage. The story of the play is laid on the Isle of Man in the years 1700 to 1710 and is, therefore, a costume play. The costumes for Arrow's film version were brought over from England by Derwent Hall Caine and are identical with those used in the London production.

Florence La Badie in a Gold Rooster

"The Pillory," a five-reel Thanhouser Gold Rooster play, to be released October 8, might be called a modern version of Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter." It is a graphic story of intolerance in which the woman is placed in a social pillory more terrible than that of the old New England times.

Florence La Badie is the star of this production and the supporting cast includes Nellie Parker Spaulding, Marie Hayne, Marie Shotwell, George Marlo, Ethyle Cook and Yale Banner. The story was written by Philip Lonergan and the production is under the direction of Frederick Sullivan.

"The Shielding Shadow" Breaks Records

Every one of Pathe's thirty exchanges has reported record business on "The Shielding Shadow," the serial which will be released October 1. These reports are particularly gratifying to Vice-President Berst because the announcement of doubled prices on "The Shielding Shadow" about a month ago in the trade journals was regarded as revolutionary and caused widespread comment. Mr. Berst in explaining this increase in prices, said that it had been made necessary by the increased cost of the serial.

The day of the trade showing of "The Shielding Shadow" in the Broadway Theater of New York was also scheduled for a meeting of the New York Exhibitors' League. Both were set for the same time. The Exhibitors' League meeting was postponed until the afternoon to give exhibitors an opportunity to view "The Shielding Shadow." Ever since that day—now more than two weeks ago—A. S. Abeles, manager of Pathe's New York Exchange, has been busy booking the serial.

From the Boston territory have also come reports of business that are extremely gratifying to the Pathe home office. One of the most important bookings reported by Manager Farrell is for a full week's showing in the Boston Theater, with a seating capacity of 3,800.

So from all the thirty offices are coming reports of record business and all this despite the fact that each theater is charged according to its seating capacity and location.

Chain theaters are not given a discount but must pay according to schedule or not play. Big theaters that offer much prestige and little cost as an inducement are told that Pathe's policy is that each house must pay its proper share, or not play this great serial.

Exhibitors Entertain Stars

By A. R. M. Sutton
Special Representative of Motography.

Seattle film men have just finished a week of entertaining Lucille Lee Stewart with her husband and director, Ralph Ince. Her leading man, Huntley Gordon, and Richard Dent, manager of Mr. Ince's Vitagraph studio at Bayshore, Long Island, were also members of the party.

The quartet arrived in the city September 11, expecting to make a one-night stand, but Seattle's film row heard of it and frustrated their plans. J. Von Herberg of the firm of Jensen & Von Herberg, theater owners and managers, took them for a trip around the boulevards Tuesday in his big new Packard car, and later on the beautiful trip to Rainier National Park on Mt. Rainier.

Tom North, Vitagraph's Seattle manager, also played host to them in several trips around the city. Wednesday evening they appeared at The Clemmer, where Manager Clemmer had suddenly changed his program, so as to show the two visiting stars in a picture directed by Mr. Ince, i.e. "His Wife's Good Name," and all three appeared before the curtain and delighted the audience with speeches, Miss Stewart adding a song or two. Friday the party was taken in tow by one of the prominent real estate men of the city, and it was whispered very quietly among certain circles that Mr. Ince was ascertaining the values of several sites which he had selected and upon which he contemplated erecting a studio in Seattle to be used by the Vitagraph Northwestern Company.

Exhibitors See "Return of Eve"

An impromptu showing in Chicago of "The Return of Eve" to a dozen exhibitors in advance of regular trade showing brought approximately fifty bookings, according to advices received from Essanay. Inasmuch as a trade showing was not contemplated and that the exhibitors saw the film when being run for officials of the company, Essanay believes its claims that the picture is out of the ordinary are substantiated. The release date on this feature has been set for October 16, through Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay Service. It was previously announced for release October 2.

"The Return of Eve" is in five acts and features Edna Mayo, supported by Eugene O'Brien. It was directed by Arthur Berthelet and taken from the stage play of the name by Lee Wilson Dodd. It deals with two children brought up in a wilderness by the terms of an eccentric millionaire's will and then plunged into civilization to be a part of the life of a colony of ultra-rich. Its contrasts between primitive passions and modern life give it an unusual interest.

"The Prince of Graustark" has been completed by Essanay and will be offered through Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay Service following "The Return of Eve."

"Crisis Owner" Entertains

Harry A. Sherman, president of the firm of Sherman-Elliott, Inc., gave an informal luncheon to the representatives of the various papers in the motion picture field at the Hotel McAlpin on Tuesday, September 19. Mr. Sherman, who is in New York in the interests of "The Crisis," the Selig production of Winston Churchill's celebrated novel, said he thought this the best way to become acquainted with the "boys," and the "boys" to a man agreed that it was, for it was one of the pleasantest luncheons the motion picture trade ever developed.

"The Crisis" will probably be shown to the trade at one of Broadway's leading film theaters some day during the week of September 24. Mr. Sherman had no announcement to make but to some questions asked merely repeated that "The Crisis" will be exploited as a road show in the territory which his firm will hold, which is all territory west of and including Chicago. As has already been announced all other territory will be sold on a state rights basis.

Helen Holmes Adopts Baby

Helen Holmes has formally adopted a baby.

The little tot had been employed to work in a few scenes in the earlier episodes of "The Lass of the Lumberlands." Miss Holmes saw it and fell in love with it. She inquired after the condition of its parents and learned that they were needy. As she grew better acquainted with the child her interest deepened and at length she asked if they would consider parting with it. They said yes and when the company left Arcata Miss Holmes had with her the little child.

The child is a girl of eight months and hereafter will be known by the name of Dorothy Motsuwan.

Four Fox Features Ready for Public

WILLIAM TOOKER, HERSCHEL MAYALL AND ALICE GALE RETURN TO FOX

BERTHA KALICH, June Caprice, Virginia Pearson, Gladys Coburn and Fritz Leiber appear in the four Fox features which were completed this past week.

"The Ragged Princess," Miss Caprice's new photoplay, will be released on October 16.

Virginia Pearson has also commenced on a new screen drama under the direction of Kenean Buel. Prominent in her supporting cast will be William Tooker, who, with Herschel Mayall and Alice Gale, has just returned to the William Fox players. Mr. Tooker acted previously in "East Lynne," "The Fool's Revenge," "A Modern Thelma," and "Ambition."

Mr. Mayall is with the Gladys Brockwell company on the west coast. He had the role of the millionaire mine-owner in "The Beast," and is recalled as the king in Ince's "Civilization."

Alice Gale, who appeared in "Sins of Men," has a record of thirty years' success on the stage. She has a part in a forthcoming production.

Besides this trio, three new actors have been added to the Fox forces. Alan Hale, late of Biograph, goes to the Richard Stanton company. He has been in the silent drama for six years and is a player of proved ability.

Olga Gray, who has come from leads with Fine Arts, and Leo Delaney, formerly of Vitagraph, are included in the Joan Sawyer cast. Mr. Delaney is a graduate of a New York law school, but he heard the siren call of the screen and put away his legal shingle.

Stuart Holmes, the villainest villain of them all, is featured in Miss Sawyer's first production for William Fox. Holmes will add the character of a ferocious gypsy to his long line of screen impersonations.

Joan Sawyer, whose twinkling feet will be perpetuated in Fox films

In the California Studios

Several photoplays are under way in the California studios. Gladys Brockwell, who played opposite William Farnum in "Fires of Conscience," is leading a double life in her film. The William Fox star has the roles both of mother and daughter in the production in work by Otis Turner and is playing each equally well.

Robert Ross, the assistant director who has been transferred from the eastern to the western studios, is busily engaged in seeing that Miss Brockwell, as the mother, does not wear any of the habiliments of Miss Brockwell, as the daughter, and vice versa.

Mr. Ross was Mr. Turner's assistant for many years before the two joined the Fox organization. He helped screen "Sporting Blood," "East Lynne," and "The Eternal Sapho."

The Stanton picture is progressing rapidly. The town of San Felease, New Mexico, was purchased last week by the Fox Film Corporation for use in the film's raid scenes. The remains of the town will be destroyed by explosion and fire while the cameras grind their hardest.

From "Legit" to the Screen

More than ninety per cent of the photoplayers in the thirteen William Fox companies in the eastern and western studios began their theatrical career with more or less auspicious parts in the spoken drama.

William Farnum gave up corneting in the Buckport, Maine, Silver Band to take the role of Lucius in his father's Boston stock company. Farnum was fourteen years old when his theatrical education began. It continued through a hundred roles in all the plays of Shakespeare.

Madame Bertha Kalich, the eminent tragedienne, was with a German opera company at the age of fourteen. She had just finished a course in the conservatory at Lemberg, Galicia. When fifteen she left this position to become a prima donna in the Jewish theater.

Joan Sawyer, the famous danseuse now in the Fox films, broke into a stage career with the Chicago company of "The Vanderbilt Cup."

Virginia Pearson gave up library work in Louisville, Kentucky, for a contract with Henry W. Savage. Miss Pearson had a small part, but she was commended for her excellent acting and in a short time was playing Portia in "The Merchant of Venice," with the New Theater organization of Washington, D. C.

The sirenic Valeska Suratt had a most unsirenic role in the first stage production in which she took part. It was that of a very motherly mother in a vaudeville sketch, and Miss Suratt was the hit of the piece.

Stuart Holmes, the last word in screen villains, made a dramatic entrance in a dramatic way. He used to stride upon a Milwaukee stage and say, during an awed silence, "The carriage awaits without, m'lord," or words to that effect.

Herbert Heyes, the hardy hero of "Under Two Flags," got his first shekels in the theatrical profession by carrying a spear in a stock production of "The Sorcerer," in Portland, Oregon.

June Caprice, the new William Fox star, made her debut among the thespians in Boston in an engagement with Andrew Mack, Harry Hilliard, who plays opposite her, obtained a foothold on the boards with Wilton Lackaye in "The Battle."

Gladys Brockwell began as the newsboy in a charity performance of "Charity Ball," in Brooklyn. She liked it so much that she records the fact that her earliest ambition was to get off the stage.

Walter Law came direct to Col. Sinn's old Park Theater after leaving college and tried for a place in a small opera company in Brooklyn. He attempted a bass part and also made a try for baritone, first and second tenor. Throughout his stay with the company he was hailed as "The boy with four voices."

A "thud-and-blunder" melodrama called "The Fast Mail," was graced by Glen White's first efforts. White says the play was so bad that he used to sneak through back alleys after each performance out of shame.

Lee "Kids" Mother in Films

Mrs. Irene Lee, mother of the famous Lee "kids," has responded to the call of the camera. Mrs. Lee has the part of the matron of the orphanage in "The Ragged Princess," June Caprice's third production for the William Fox films.

Little Jane Lee, aged four, and Katherine, aged six, are in the same picture with their mother. While the photoplay was being screened Jane, veteran of ten films, and Katherine, who has acted in five, smiled sympathetically as Mrs. Lee was taught the few things that she had not learned about pictures in watching her daughters act.

Bara Appears in Person at Fox Theatre

The week of September 24 was Anniversary Week at William Fox's Academy of Music. "Her Double Life," starring Theda Bara, was the screen attraction. On the evening of Wednesday, September 27, Miss Bara appeared at the Academy in person.

Alan Hale Joins Fox Players

Alan Hale has joined the William Fox players on the Pacific coast. Mr. Hale came from the Biograph company, with whom he had leads, and has been in motion pictures for six years, although he was born in Washington, D. C., as late as 1892.

He was educated in the public schools of Philadelphia, then by stock experience in the principal cities of the United States, and took a year and a half of post-graduate work in vaudeville.

Before becoming a member of the Biograph forces he was with Lubin and Reliance.

Here's the touch of youngster that forms one of the appealing spots in Fox's "Fires of Conscience," in which Bill Farnum is a burly deputy sheriff.

About Vitagraph Players and Plays

STRAND BOOKS "THE CHATTEL" FOR SOLID WEEK

Is there anybody who doesn't know this star, who is now recovering from a real automobile accident?

LILLIAN WALKER, the dimpled Vitagraph star, is just now recovering from a serious automobile accident in which she was injured a few days ago. The accident occurred near New York when the machine in which the star and some other Vitagraph players were riding turned turtle. The company was en route to Mineola to film some of the scenes in a coming Blue Ribbon feature.

The accident occurred when the chauffeur swerved Miss Walker's machine in order to get out of the way of a Ford. The wheels skidded and the car turned turtle, pinning the chauffeur, Miss Walker, Wilfrid North, her director, and Bob Galliard, who was also in the machine, beneath its weight. The players were unable to free themselves until assistance came, after which they were rushed to the Mineola Hospital. Director North is believed to be suffering from fractured ribs.

Strand Theater Books "The Chattel"

As you read this announcement the Strand Theater, of New York, acknowledged one of the world's very finest motion picture houses, will be showing Vitagraph's first E. H. Sothern release, an original story entitled "The Chattel," written by Paul West, directed by Frederick Thomson.

Mitchell H. Mark, president and general manager of the Strand Theater Corporation, deliberately switched the announced program for the week beginning September 24 in order to headline the Strand's bill with Mr. Sothern's first appearance in motion pictures. Not only did he order a switch made in the program to include this Greater Vitagraph production, but he issued instructions to launch an immediate campaign of advertising more extensive than any the Strand has ever undertaken on behalf of any previous picture.

To the exhibitors of this country, the action of this theater man is clearly a sign-post pointing in one direction. Backed by a Broadway run and the extensive advertising that it will have received through the Strand Theater, "The Chattel" should prove to be a big money maker.

One evening at the Strand, Mr. Sothern, accompanied by his wife, Julia Marlowe, personally witnessed his own premier on the screen as a guest of Commodore and Mrs. Blackton. In the box party other guests were Miss Peggy Hyland, the famous English actress who is Mr. Sothern's leading woman in "The Chattel," and Paul West, author of the story. The box party followed a dinner party given by Commodore and Mrs. Blackton.

Greater Vitagraph Presents "Through the Wall"

"Through the Wall" is one of the finest mystery pictures Vitagraph has ever produced. For genuine thrills and subtle detective work it equals Sherlock Holmes at his best. It is one of those pictures in which the suspense is completely sustained in every reel. It is the cleanest kind of a picture and absolutely true to life.

Cleveland Moffett has written several bully good stories that have been transformed into Vitagraph features, but never before has he sensed the possibilities of the screen as in "Through the Wall," and under the guiding hand of Director Rollin S. Sturgeon Mr. Moffett's scenes develop terrific punch.

William Duncan, who plays the role of the detective, has a magnificent part that he makes the most of. Nell Shipman enacts the role of Heidelman's stepdaughter.

Alice Joyce, in a New Vitagraph Play

The most significant combination of Vitagraph stars in any forthcoming release except Commodore Blackton's big spectacle, "The Battle Cry of War," have just begun work in a new play at the Brooklyn studios. They are Harry Morey, Alice Joyce and Marc MacDermott, and their vehicle is a new play by Commodore J. Stuart Blackton and Cyrus Townsend Brady. It is being directed by Wm. P. S. Earle. Mr. Morey and Miss Joyce have been working together in "The Battle Cry of War." Mr. MacDermott has just finished a big dual personality story directed by Charles Brabin. The new play in which these three meet all together for the first time is an intense drama the name of which will be announced later.

Earle Williams Again Cast

Having completed his big C. N. & A. M. Williamson serial, "The Scarlet Runner," the Vitagraph star, Earle Williams, is already at work for forthcoming

"Through the Wall," the Vitagraph six-part play featuring Nell Shipman, William Duncan and George Holt. Delivered Oct. 2.

Blue Ribbon releases which come regularly after the run of the automobile adventure story is completed. The story in which he is now busy is by James Oliver Curwood. Naomi Childers will play opposite Mr. Williams. She is the eleventh different heroine with whom he has been cast in the last nine months. The direction of this film has been placed in the hands of Vitagraph's woman director, Miss Marguerite Bertsch, who has just completed "The Devil's Prize," which she wrote and directed in five weeks' time.

Arthur Hoops Dead

The sudden and dramatic death of Arthur Hoops, the popular leading man in many Metro productions, who died in his automobile last week while driving to his home in Bayside, Long Island, is marked with many striking coincidences. Mr. Hoops was apparently in excellent health when he left the Popular Players studio. He had been working in some of the final scenes in "The Orchid Lady," in which Mme. Petrova is starred, and which is now being completed under the direction of Burton King. On the previous day Mr. Hoops worked in a big scene near Dover, New Jersey. Strangely enough, in this scene he was supposed to be killed. The title which will appear on the screen, in advance of this scene, by one of the coincidences of life, reads: "The Hand of Destiny."

Arthur Hoops, Metro star who died in his automobile.

The players associated with Mr. Hoops—and few men were more popular—recalled that Mr. Hoops laughingly remarked a few minutes before he worked in the scene in Dover:

"Well, good bye fellows—here is where I die. You slaves can go on and finish the picture while I am dead."

The actor's death was due to heart failure. He was always nervous when riding in an automobile. He never allowed his chauffeur to drive faster than fifteen miles an hour.

The morning of the day he died Mr. Hoops purchased a new Mitchell car. He made several calls on friends after he was through working and started toward his home on Long Island. It has developed that his negro chauffeur came within a few inches of running down a man not fifteen minutes before Mr. Hoops was found dying in his car. Along with other coincidences the man was Charles A. Taylor, the scenario expert, employed in the general offices of Metro. Mr. Taylor was crossing Broadway when a machine suddenly came from round a corner. Mr. Taylor jumped back, and not a second too soon. The automobile came to a stop, then shot on. Mr. Taylor saw that it was Mr. Hoops in the car, and he shouted after him. There was no response, and he saw Mr. Hoops settle back, as if drawing a deep sigh of relief. Fifteen minutes later he was dead.

Mr. Hoops was one of the best known leading men on the screen. He appeared in support of Mary Pickford and Marguerite Clark, in several notable screen productions, before he came to Metro. He has been in many big features with Mme. Petrova, including "Playing with Fire," "The Soul Market," "The Eternal Question," "Extravagence," "The Weaker Sex," and "The Orchid Lady." Before going into motion pictures Mr. Hoops was well known on Broadway where he appeared in several stage successes. He was forty-six years old, and his home was in Milwaukee.

EXPERTS ON "WAR BRIDES"

Herbert Brenon Will Allow No Discrepancies in His Work and Is Using Expert Advice in the Settings for the Various Scenes

In producing his photodramatic version of "War Brides," Herbert Brenon is taking every precaution against technical discrepancies and inconsistencies such as often creep into the best of motion picture plays. One of the big scenes takes place in a hospital to which wounded soldiers are brought from the battle front, and the players who take the parts of physicians, attendants and Red Cross nurses had the advantage of being supervised in their work by Dr. Orrin S. Wightman. Dr. Wightman visited the Brenon studio at Hudson Heights this week, when some of the big scenes were being made, and volunteered to give Mr. Brenon the benefit of his technical knowledge in the hospital scene. As has frequently occurred in the European war, this hospital is a church.

Other expert "consulting directors" who are aiding Mr. Brenon are two Roman Catholic priests from a church not far from the studio. These two fathers were present when Mr. Brenon directed the scenes showing the marriage of the "War Brides" to the departing soldiers, and scrutinized closely all details of the ceremony, and the fittings of the church and altar, guaranteeing perfection to a Belascoesque nicety. While the company was in Connecticut for a week, making a large number of outdoor scenes, the big church was built in the roomy studio, and three hundred extra players engaged for the ensembles.

Concerning the work done out of town, it is reported that Nazimova displayed versatility in certain directions, unexpected even of this clever woman, the nature of these revelations, however, being kept secret until the release of the completed photodrama, which will be probably early in November, through Lewis J. Selznick.

Curious are the ways—and ambitions—of man. Tom Burrough, the William Fox [illegible] actor, would have been ostracized by all of his playmates in Clinton County, Illinois, had they known that "Tommy's" great desire was to grow up into the superintendency of schools.

Mr. Burrough entered moving pictures in 1909, with the first company ever organized, so he has the right to call himself a pioneer.

Grace Darmond, star in Pathe's [illegible] "The Shielding Shadow," spent several days [illegible] at the home of her parents in Chicago. She [illegible] make a tour of Canadian theaters.

Ann Pennington in Second Feature

WILLIAM D' A. HOPKINS, CELEBRATED MODELER, JOINS PARAMOUNT FORCES

ENORMOUS publicity and advertising aids have been prepared by the Paramount Pictures Corporation in connection with the two main features on its program for the week of October 9. Ann Pennington will make her second appearance on the Paramount program in "The Rainbow Princess," produced by the Famous Players, and Vivian Martin will be starred in "Miss Nancy," a Pallas production.

During the same week the "little features" released by Paramount will consist of the 35th edition of the "magazine-on-the-screen," the Paramount Pictographs, the 36th of the series of "trips-around-the-world," conducted by Burton Holmes, in which he will take his fellow travelers through "Old Ireland," and the Paramount-Bray cartoon, "Col. Heeza Liar Gets Married," from the pen of J. R. Bray.

The four leading subjects of the Pictographs show how wild oysters are captured, planted, grown, polished, tagged and all stages through which the oyster passes; showing the public how to make its municipalities more beautiful is an inspiration to turn ugly, unsightly pools into ideal gardens of wonderful artistic arrangement; "Converting Wood Into Paper" tells the story of how after the discovery that printing paper could be made from wood, the industry was revolutionized and the penny newspaper made possible; and the first showing of motion picture sculpture originated by William d'A. Hopkins.

The Paramount-Burton Holmes travel picture for the week takes a trip "In Old Ireland," beginning with Belfast, after which Glasgow and Dublin are visited and the entire country including Achill Island and other interesting points are visited, and ending with a ride on the Ballybumston Maro-Railway train.

During the course of J. R. Bray's cartoon "Col. Heeza Liar Gets Married" the Col.'s new wife goes on a strike for an eight-hour day and insists upon the Colonel making his own meals.

Second Paramount Comedy Released

"Bridget's Blunder" is the title of the second Paramount Comedy to be released October 16. This is said to be more screamingly laughable than the first and contains the same union of real plot with real actors, coupled with the greatest trick camera work ever conceived. This comedy was produced by the United States Pictures Corporation.

Paramount's Aids to Exhibitors

One of the features of the exhibitor's aid campaign which has been inaugurated by the Paramount Pictures Corporation in the nation-wide endeavor to have its exhibitors present its productions in the cleverest manner possible, is the suggestive methods it is offering upon each of the productions of Famous Players, Lasky, Morosco and Pallas.

For months past Paramount realized that there was a service needed by the exhibitor far more necessary than that of simply giving him two feature productions and four single reel pictures each week, and that was the service of "putting the show across." Consequently every Paramount exchange throughout the country has established its "Exhibitor's Aid Department" and has been supplied with a hundred and one means of promoting publicity, advertising and exhibitors' business, which will be distributed to the exhibitors without cost.

To Advertise "The Quest of Life"

Many suggestions have been sent to the exhibitor by which he can attract attention to his productions. In connection with "The Quest of Life" produced by Famous Players, in which Maurice and Florence Walton, the internationally famous dancing stars are featured, exhibitors are requested to have their local dancing celebrity view the picture and review the production in the leading newspaper from the dancing angle, and that advertisements to the effect that this picture will show everyone the very latest dance steps should be spread broadcast.

In this production Florence Walton wears twenty-five different gowns which were designed by one of the world's greatest modistes and the exhibitors are having their leading department stores copy these designs and displaying them in their show windows in the main stores of the city, securing the aid of the society editors of the leading newspapers to write critical explanations of the costumes which are worn by the dancer in the pictures. Many of the exhibitors are planning lobby displays in gowns, something that has never before been done in connection with motion pictures but which will have a wonderfully human appeal for the feminine sex.

Exploiting the Rainbow Princess

In connection with "The Rainbow Princess," in which Ann Pennington is starred, there have gone forth many clever and unique suggestions for attracting attention. This being a circus picture, parades led by clowns will be used by some exhibitors and in view of the fact that many cities were not favored with circuses this summer because of the infantile paralysis the showmen are advertising that they have at last smuggled one into town to be seen at their theater.

Others will attach passes to balloons they will send up from the front of their theater each day, and the persons obtaining these balloons when they land will be granted free admission.

One of the clever suggestions to be used in the presenting of "The Daughter of MacGregor," a Famous Players production in which Valentine Grant is the star, was to put kilts and tams on the ushers (providing they were that kind of ushers). Street parades led by Highlanders with bag pipes is another clever medium, while a third was the use of a Scotch collie with blanket signs announcing the production, and which added additional weight by reason of the fact that in the production a feature is Miss Grant's wonderful dog.

Clever Modeler Joins Paramount

William d'A. Hopkins, the well-known Scotch artist and sculptor, who recently invented a new method of doing animated modeling for motion pictures, has given Paramount Pictures Corporation the opportunity of showing his first wonderful works to the lovers of motion picture novelty.

The first of a series of his work will be shown in a forthcoming release of the magazine-on-the-screen, the Paramount Pictographs. In the modeling of his characters, besides the wonderful dexterity, every movement of his hand is a new picture and his product is filled with wholesome humor.

In his first sculptured picture he tells a pathetic story of Pricilla and her encounter with the Pesky Fly. The fly makes his entrance on the bridge of Pricilla's nose, which is a very homely nose but a perfect match for the rest of Pricilla's face. The fly's soft footfalls, as he steals about, soon lulls the maiden to sleep. Then she dreams a wonderful dream.

Her features become transformed so that she looks like the sister of Venus with captivating dimples with not even a fly to disturb. But what a pity that she must wake, and wake she does and finds she still has her old features with her.

PICKFORD FILM COMPLETED

First Production of the Artcraft Pictures Corporation Will Be Ready for October Release—Wells Hawks Starts on Publicity Campaign

All who are looking forward so eagerly to Mary Pickford's first production under her own company, the Artcraft Pictures Corporation, will be pleased to learn that "Less Than Dust" is now completed and the cutting and assembling is going on rapidly so that there will be no delay in the October release date tentatively announced.

In this play Miss Pickford appears as a little English girl dwelling among the lower caste of a city of modern India. The story deals with her love for a commander of the local garrison and the efforts of the wife of another officer to break up this love and later to get her to leave the commander after they are married. She goes out into the desert with a bottle of poison and is about to take her own life when her husband finds her.

Nearly fifty players are required to portray the story of "Less Than the Dust." David Powell, Mary Alden and Francis Joyner take the principal roles. Others in the cast include Mario Majeroni, Ceasare Gravina, Russell Bassett, Walter Morgan and Mercita Esmonde.

Wells Hawks, personal representative for Mary Pickford, following the completion of her first picture for the Artcraft Pictures Corporation, has started on a continent-wide trip to blaze the trail through the newspapers. This trip is a sample of the indirect co-operation of Artcraft with the exhibitor. Mr. Hawks will not work with the exhibitor at all but will pile up a volume of personal publicity for Mary Pickford which will be followed by the special campaign arranged to exploit "Less Than the Dust."

Mary Pickford in her oriental role in "Less Than the Dust."

While on tour for Miss Pickford he will visit the Artcraft exchanges in Philadelphia, Washington, Atlanta, Dallas, Kansas City, Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh. He will also be in touch with the newly formed Artcraft Pictures Corporation, Ltd., in Toronto, the birthplace of Mary Pickford, which is the center of distribution of her new productions in Canada. He is expected to return with a budget of recommendations for achieving perfect co-operation between Artcraft, the branch managers and the exhibitors whom they serve.

Holmes, Gray and Delaney in Sawyer Film

Stuart Holmes, the villain inimitable, will be featured in Joan Sawyer's initial production for William Fox. Mr. Holmes will add the character of a ferocious gypsy to his long line of screen impersonations.

Olga Gray, who has been playing leads with Fine Arts, and Leo Delaney, formerly of the Vitagraph Company, are also included in the cast. Miss Gray left the stage for the silent drama in 1915, and has acted in many pictures.

Mr. Delaney is a native of Swanton, Vermont, where he was born in 1885. After attending Manhattan College, in New York City, he went to New York Law School, and joined the legal profession upon graduation. He soon took down his shingle, however, for a brief stage engagement, and liked the new work so much that he has never hung it out again. He was with Vitagraph for seven years.

Nat Goodwin Becomes Producer

Nat Goodwin has become a full fledged producer. He has incorporated in the laws of New York State, "The Nat C. Goodwin Photo-play Corporation," with a capital of $1,000,000, with studios at San Jancinto, California. The corporation purchased the 1,000-acre plot owned by Mr. Goodwin, which, it is said, has every advantage of scenery for the portrayal of almost any kind of picture.

The output of this company will be four large productions a year, with possibly some shorter features for general distribution. The first feature to be released will be "The Prince of Broadway," from a scenario by John W. Gorman, and directed by Byron Totten. This will be started in about three weeks, October 15th to October 20th. Nat Goodwin will be the star.

The members of the company are Nat C. Goodwin, John W. Gorman, B. F. Moran and Walter Mc[illegible]. Executive offices will be opened in New York City.

Fred Myton of the Universal scenario [illegible] is working on a five-reel story, "The Opal Ring."

J. P. McGowan, director-general of the [illegible] Company, now in the heart of the redwoods, finding that the switchtender of the station was ill offered to [illegible] him while a number of scenes were taken.

Star Goes "Back to Nature"

INTERNATIONAL APPOINTS B. F. LYON DISTRICT MANAGER

ELAINE HAMMERSTEIN, star of the International Film Service, believes that a woman can successfully cope bare-handed with nature as well as a man and has gone into the mountains to prove her theory.

Accompanied by "Joe" Knowles, famous "nature-man," Miss Hammerstein left on Saturday night for the heart of the Adirondack mountains, where for thirty days, each will endeavor to live by the work of his hands and with only the weapons provided by nature.

Miss Hammerstein will be accompanied by her mother, as chaperone, but Mrs. Hemmerstein will not assist her daughter in any manner during the thirty days' experience.

Twice before Knowles has gone into the mountain fastnesses. Once he went in naked without weapons or implements. At the end of thirty days he emerged, fully clothed. During his stay he provided his own food by trapping and fishing, painted pictures and wrote on birch bark the record of his experiences.

On the present test, Mr. Knowles will be clothed, but will later discard the clothing with which he enters for covering he has made. During the first few days he will teach Miss Hammerstein the rudiments of woodcraft—the building of fires by friction, the construction of a shelter, trapping, and the making of garments.

Then each will start on his own account for a battle with nature.

Miss Hammerstein, upon entering the mountains, wore a khaki uniform which will be replaced by the clothing she makes from the skins of animals she captures, from woven grass and other material from the wilds. She, too, will keep a diary on birch bark and will endeavor, as will Knowles, to paint several pictures.

Miss Hammerstein is twenty years old, the daughter of Arthur Hammerstein and the granddaughter of the famous Oscar Hammerstein. She is prominent socially in New York, has never been without the services of a maid and has enjoyed every comfort and luxury of life. Yet she believes she can go into the mountains, bare-handed, and live. This remarkable test is being made under the auspices of the New York American.

Lyon Appointed District Manager

The International Film Service, Inc., has announced the appointment of B. F. Lyon, manager of the Pittsburgh Exchange, to the position of district manager. In his new position Mr. Lyon will act as assistant to J. K. Burger, assistant general manager in charge of exchanges. His field will be the entire United States, and he will visit the different exchanges, instilling into the branch managers the ideas of the home office. Mr. Lyon has been in charge of the Pittsburgh exchange of the International since its organization. Prior to that time he was with the Pathe Exchange.

Edward J. McGurty will succeed Mr. Lyon as manager of the Pittsburgh branch. Mr. McGurty, who was formerly with the Liberty Film Company, and subsequently represented Pathe in West Virginia, joined the International Film Service in April of this year as a road man, working under the supervision of Mr. Lyon.

Big Advertising for Jaffery

The International will use approximately 300,000 lines of newspaper display advertising in its exploiting of the first two of its Golden Eagle Features, "Jaffery" and "The Flower of Faith." The International adopted this policy on its serials, but it is the first time that such a gigantic expenditure has ever been made for advertising photoplay features. This advertising, is, of course, in addition to the regular amount of trade paper advertising that will be used for bringing these two features before the public.

The enormous success of "Jaffery" is bringing into the limelight Eleanor Woodruff, who portrays the character of Doria. Miss Woodruff has had a remarkable career both as a legitimate and screen actress. Her first engagement was with the Orpheum Stock Company and she received a salary of four dollars a week. Later she was made leading lady at the salary of six dollars a week and now she has risen to a point where she is one of the highest paid leading ladies in the profession. Upon completion of her work in "Jaffery," Miss Woodruff was engaged as leading lady for Otis Skinner for the present season.

McClure Series Not an Allegory

The recently published statement that the new McClure release, "Seven Deadly Sins," is to be an allegorical series, is announced by McClure Publications to be a misinterpretation, though perhaps a natural conclusion when the statement upon which the assertion was based is considered.

Here is the published item that led to the misconstruction:

"Seven Deadly Sins" will be issued as a series of seven five-reel feature plays, each complete in itself. For instance, the first McClure play in which Ann Murdock, the Frohman star, is to appear, is called "Envy." The second one, in which Holbrook Blinn is the most important player, is called "Pride." Charlotte Walker is to play "Sloth," Nance O'Neill "Greed," and so on until all the seven deadly sins have been portrayed on the screen. Each play is complete in itself and will stand on its own feet, but all seven form a group that can be advertised together.

While based upon a morality theme, "Seven Deadly Sins" is far removed from plays of the type of "Everyman."

The action of "Seven Deadly Sins" occurs in the present, amidst the glamour and glitter of metropolitan life. There will be no allegorical figures to typify "Envy," "Pride," "Greed," "Sloth," etc. Instead, these evils will be represented by men and women of today.

Through "Seven Deadly Sins" runs a connected love story. The girl, Eve Leslie (portrayed by Shirley Mason), is championed by Adam Moore (depicted by George Le Guere), a virile young American who rescues her from perils and predicaments without end.

By thus showing a young girl's triumphs over the evils of her generation, "Seven Deadly Sins" presents a strong moral lesson, but the plays are so colorful and so swift with action that the morality appeal is entirely to the subconsciousness of the spectators.

A genuine blood transfusion operation is one of the features of the Triangle Fine Arts production "Bugs" (temporary title), featuring Wilfred Lucas and Constance Talmadge.

McCLURE ADDS DIRECTOR

Man Who Captured Carranza and Villa Soldiers Now Directing Charlotte Walker in the Fourth McClure Picture, "Sloth"

Theodore Marston, formerly of the Vitagraph Company, has been engaged by McClure Pictures to direct the production of "Sloth," the fourth play in the McClure series of seven five-reel feature plays—"Seven Deadly Sins." Mr. Marston's work will supplement that of the other McClure directors, Richard Ridgely and Alan Crosland, who are engaged upon other plays in this feature series. Charlotte Walker is to be the star of "Sloth."

Theodore Marston, McClure Director.

In securing Theodore Marston, McClure's has not only secured a remarkable director, but a man of wonderful versatility and experience, having been civil engineer, actor, soldier and director.

Marston was educated as a civil engineer. He spent three years on the Northwestern frontier, after which he decided to go on the stage, and for several seasons appeared in leading character parts. Mr. Marston was favorably mentioned for his work in "Quo Vadis," "Janice Meredith," "Under Two Flags," "The Virginian," "Alias Jimmy Valentine" and "The Man of the House." His last stage appearance was with William H. Crane in "The Senator Keeps House" and the revival of "A Fool of Fortune" at the Garrick Theater, New York.

In 1912 Mr. Marston entered the moving picture industry, starting as director for Pathe Freres. Later on he became associated with the Kinemacolor Company and the Vitagraph forces. During the three years of his service with this company he directed many of their big features.

Mr. Marston's father was Colonel Marston of the Federal Army in the Civil War, and at the outbreak of the Spanish American War, Mr. Marston enlisted and became Adjutant to Colonel Willard Glazier. Mr. Marston was one of the organizers of the volunteer regiment composed entirely of the sons of veterans of the armies of the world.

At the beginning of the Mexican trouble, Mr. Marston was making "The Secret Kingdom" serial down along the border. He earned the distinction of being about the only man in the border town who didn't carry a six shooter on the hip.

The strength of his personality was demonstrated by the fact that in a great many of his mob scenes there were members of Carranza's and Villa's army who had the reputation of recognizing no superior but the man who held a six shooter clutched in his fist. Mr. Marston without a gun controlled the unscrupulous bandits and though he bears no bullet wounds or knife scars, he managed to get the scenes he wanted.

Neilan a Lasky Director

Marshall Neilan, well known leading man, and prominent also as a director, has taken up his new work as one of the Lasky directors at the Hollywood studio of the company. Mr. Neilan took leading role some months ago in the Lasky production of "The Country Boy," and he has also appeared as leading man for the Famous Players Film Company in "Madame Butterfly," in support of Mary Pickford, and in "Little Pal" with the same star.

In the past few years Mr. Neilan has been connected with various companies. He was recently with the Selig Company.

Big World Mob Scene

What will rank as one of the biggest "mob scenes" ever shown in a program photoplay was staged for "The Gilded Cage," in which Alice Brady is starred. This is a World-Brady picture, and the scene represents a great riot at the palace gates. William A. Brady, who has produced many of the most sensational scenes of this nature ever conceived for the speaking theater, fairly reveled in the larger opportunities provided by a practically unlimited out-of-doors setting and as many players as he called for.

Triangle Full of Horses

Six hundred horsemen are said to have been used in staging the run to the rescue scene in the Triangle Fine Arts production, "The Defenders." These horsemen appear as United States cavalrymen who rescue Bessie Love from the horde of Mexicans and Indians.

For two weeks the Franklin brothers scoured Los Angeles and vicinity for ex cow-punchers to do some daredevil riding in the scene. These scenes are among the best ever filmed of galloping horsemen. The Defenders is being produced by C. M. and S. A. Franklin

First Five Part Pioneer

Nathan Hirsh, president of the Pioneer Film Corporation, announces the completion of his first five-reel production, "The Soul of a Child." This is the first of a series of big pictures that will be produced under the Pioneer Banner, and state righted.

The picture was made at Block Island and features Em Gorman, the veteran child actress.

What is said to be one of the fiercest hand-to-hand clashes between two bodies of men ever staged [illegible] screen is one of the thrilling incidents in "The [illegible]ment," the powerfully dramatic Triangle play in which Thomas H. Ince presents Bessie Barriscale as star. The encounter takes place in the early part of the story and depicts a bitter and bloody fight between strikers and strikebreakers in a small New England mill town.

Some wonderful results have been attained by Essanay through the use of the telephoto [illegible] photographing the scenic wonders of western [illegible]. In one picture the camera man, though seven miles away, caught a group of mountain climbers in the Rockies so clearly that even their Alpine sticks were apparent. These scenics are being released by Essanay in split reels.

Psychology of Motion Picture Making

"CIVILIZATION" GREAT SUCCESS AS STATE RIGHTS PROPOSITION

THE motion picture has been termed, with some pretense to authority, the greatest art the world so far has seen. It includes all other arts—literature; music; sculpture; architecture; acting; poetry; painting, photography. If you aspire to make a great motion picture, you must draw upon all these manifestations of creative mentality.

And you will find it essential to go much further than this. You must be archaeologist; historian; engineer; chemist; naval and military expert; interior decorator; fashion expert; "tinker"; tailor; soldier; apothecary; ploughboy. The sum of human knowledge must be at your finger tips, for you are called upon to show in it on the screen.

Thomas H. Ince has this encyclopedic mentality. By its aid he has enrolled himself amongst the limited list of the world's master picture producers, of which there are under half a score. There are movie directors in profusion—hundreds, in fact, who work to formulae; who "put on" things; who are handed scripts and stars and told to make a sure-fire attraction which will pack 'em in. This is not creative art; it is sweatshop shoddyism—a disease from which the picture has suffered very severely in recent years. Pot-boilerism of a crude and repulsive kind.

Ince, the man appears in Ince pictures, and notably in "Civilization,"—the natural man, the artist, the thinker, the dreamer. Birth, training, environment, ambition made him a master picture producer; the same mind in the same man would have manifested great things in other fields of endeavor—creative; professional; manufacturing—had it been so applied.

This is not a "hyperbolical effusion," but a cold analysis of the reasons why there are as yet so few great motion producers and pictures, and why "Civilization" is included among the few of the latter. In the great art of the motion picture, he who thinks salacity produces salacity—hence censorship is a troublous sore all over the world.

Ince is a clean thinker and has always produced clean pictures. This can be seen in the tender message to humanity which "Civilization" conveys.

No great work of art that is produced is lost to the world, so long as its physical existence has been preserved.

The theme of "Civilization" has been used once and for all. The bitter irony of the story told on the screen will stand for ages.

The motion picture, after twenty-five years of existence, is said to be the basis of the fifth largest business in the world, as well as the greatest of all arts.

What will it be in fifty years time? It is safe to hazard the opinion that the short length futilities which are mechanically produced in such painful profusion today will have died the death. In the last two years this great art has passed through a serious crisis and has survived it. The butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker; the button hole maker, and the sweatshop keeper have had their fling at picture making with disastrous results to the art. There has been a surfeit of mediocre and ineptitudinous things shown on the screen. The fool has rushed in where the wise man treads cautiously. Millions of dollars have been lost in movie making simply because the people who invaded the domain of the art knew nothing about it.

All these hopeless seekers after the unattainable are doomed to extinction or relegation to more suitable fields of endeavor. There is no room for the banal, the stupid, the ineffective in the field of the Motion Picture.

Big Productions Kill "Program"

The "program" is either dead or moribund, according to many shrewd motion picture men. The demand is for big productions, of which at present, there are all too few available. This is a reversion to the primal condition of things in the industry.

"Civilization," Thos. H. Ince's great spectacle, is so successful as a state right proposition, so far as it has gone, that the Harper Film Corporation, who control the picture, are hard put to it to keep pace with the demand for unallotted territories.

It may be true that the program will temporarily survive in the smaller houses, but it appears to be clear from the evidence that short length subjects are in the long run doomed and that the public demand for big and costly productions will have to be satisfied.

The volume of unsolicited territory which reaches the Harper Film Corporation from State right buyers; from exhibitors and, above all, from the general public, irresistibly favors the big spectacular production in preference to many other forms of the motion picture.

Ince Discovers New Instrument

Thomas H. Ince has discovered a unique musical instrument that seems to possess supernatural tones.

It is called the Choralcelo and operates along the general lines of the pipe organ, but creates sounds never before obtained except by the human voice or natural objects emitting their own peculiar sounds.

The instrument has been installed at the Park Theater at an expense of $50,000 and is used in conjunction with every presentation of "Civilization."

The tones of the Choralcelo are produced magnetically by a pulsating electric current passing through each magnet, thus causing natural synchronism with each note, that is to be vibrated.

New Mutual Bennett for October 9

"Philip Holden—Waster," the Mutual Star Production of October 9, featuring Richard Bennett, the eminent actor, is the re-title for the five-part production "His Brother's Keeper," announced when Mr. Bennett's contract with the American Film Company was made public as the vehicle for Mr. Bennett's second appearance in Mutual Star Productions.

"Philip Holden—Waster" will be released on Monday, October 9, but instead of marking the star's second appearance in Mutual Star Productions, it will mark his first. "The Sable Blessing," scheduled for release on September 11, was postponed after release date announcement, and will not go out to the public until a date after the appearance of "Philip Holden—Waster."

Director George Sargent has spared no expense to give this picture its required setting of luxury and ease.

Scenes unrivalled in beauty and screen art value have been secured.

Dominated by Richard Bennett's delightful personality, "Philip Holden—Waster" yet has room for plenty of other dramatic work of unusual merit. Rhea Mitchell is seen to wonderful advantage in her role of "Helen Landon." Adrienne Morrison (Mrs. Richard Bennett), George Periolat, Clarence Burton, and Orral Humphrey are also in excellent supporting roles.

ARBUCKLE TO LEAVE KEYSTONE

Roscoe Arbuckle to Start His Own Producing Company January First—Will Release One Two-Reel Comedy a Month

Roscoe Arbuckle tried to slip in and out of Chicago without being seen—but it's pretty easy to see Roscoe, so MOTOGRAPHY caught him. Mr. Arbuckle is on his way west after a long season in New York.

As it is pretty easy to see Roscoe, so it is pretty easy to get his secrets from him—on some subjects which he would just as soon everyone knew about because he couldn't keep them dark much longer anyway. So he divulged the startling news that after January he will no longer be a Keystone comedian but will begin work with his own producing company. The output of this company will be one two-reel comedy each month. This famous funmaker claims that you cannot make people laugh for five reels so he is going to make them "simply scream" for two.

The name of Mr. Arbuckle's concern will be the Comique Film Corporation and J. M. Schenck of the Loew enterprises will be associated with him. The company may later try producing some dramas but at first will stick close to the comedies. Mr. Arbuckle has a rather new idea in the starting of a company in that he is not going to have any stock company of players. His entire force is to consist of three people, himself, Al St. John and a girl—and he didn't tell who the girl was, perhaps he doesn't know that himself. The rest of the players will be picked up as needed and dropped again after they have served their purpose.

Mr. Arbuckle will direct most of the productions himself but not all of them. Another of his hobbies is that he wants to develop new people, and he announces that he will gradually work out himself. He does not especially want to feature his own features and actions, but just wants to get into the producing end of the business.

He is going to pay especial attention to his writers and gather a staff which can furnish him with different ideas and many novelties. His plan of releasing has not yet been definitely formulated—although Mr. Arbuckle says that he has had a number of tempting offers made to him, and admitted that the state rights basis looks very good to him.

Screening in Grand Ball Room

"The Common Law," the film adaptation of the Robert W. Chambers novel with Clara Kimball Young in the leading role, was shown for the first time at the Hotel St. Regis, New York, on the evening of September 22. The screening of a photoplay in the grand ball room of the St. Regis, one of New York's most dignified hostelries, caused no end of comment along Broadway's film corners. Certainly there was considerable of the "brilliance" the society reporters talk about so much in connection with the premier showing of the seven-reel production produced under the direction of Albert Capellani which will soon be offered to exhibitors throughout the country by Lewis J. Selznick. The feature is now drawing big crowds at the Studebaker Theater, Chicago.

Monarch Company Organized

The organization of the Monarch Photoplay Company, of which he is president, marks the latest activity of Bob Russell, who has been a well-known figure in film circles for a long time. The new company of which Mr. Russell is the head has completed a picturization of "Common Sense Brackett." This is to be the first of a series of feature productions.

Bob Russell, who has organized a new company

"Common Sense Brackett" was produced with great success on the speaking stage by Henry W. Savage, with Richard Golden in the titular role. As a stage production it played a year in New York and in Chicago, while a road tour that was successful took the play into all the important cities of the country.

The film version is in six reels. Its exterior scenes were taken on the picturesque shores of Lake Sunapee in New Hampshire, that section of the country where the story is laid. The cast includes William Fredericks, formerly with Famous Players; William Sorelle, who has played with well-known stars, notably with Marguerite Clark in "The Prince and the Pauper"; Barbara Gilroy, featured in a number of Thanhouser productions; Bradley Barker, Mildred Gregory, Dallas Fitzgerald and Walter Hiers.

This company of popular players has been retained for future productions of the Monarch Photoplay Company. Mr. Russell intends to start work immediately on the next feature. "Common Sense Brackett" will probably be marketed on the state rights basis. The picture will be shown at the Studebaker some day during the present week.

Ruth Stonehouse has filmed and played in her own story, "Mary Anne's First Job."

No Over-Production Says Brady

QUALITY MAKES OVER PRODUCTION AND COMPETITION LOOK SICK

WILLIAM A. BRADY, director general of the World Film Corporation, claims that "there is no over-production of good pictures. There is no such thing as too much competition in meritorious output. Salaries of actors who draw the public pay themselves automatically. The program system is the only one under which the exhibitor can thrive and the producer exist at all.

"It is the inferior picture that is over-produced. There is nobody who can tell to a moral certainty that the great public will respond to his photoplay. But if he possesses the knowledge of what makes drama, and knows good photography from bad, and has a fair knack of mending broken bridges, the producer is in a position to establish a first rate average of quality.

"And quality is what counts. It makes over-production, competition and the rest look sick.

"There is a theory to the effect that experience as a producing manager for the speaking theater is valueless in the motion picture world—that the two lines are so far apart as to nullify a man's skill in one of them when he applies himself to the other.

"Never in the world was there a more absurd assertion. For example, when I came into the motion picture field I noticed among other matters that scenery, properties, costumes and the like were not always on hand when the actors were ready to proceed, and that long delays ensued, during which the salaries and other expenses ran on. This would not amount to much on the speaking stage, where rehearsals are not usually paid for, but what would be thought of a producing manager in the regular theater who allowed his play to go up to its actual first night without a complete equipment of scenes, props and dresses?

"It was this very experience of mine in theater productions which showed me one of the most common and serious channels of that absolute wastefulness and disregard for consequences which have been so costly to photoplay producers.

"This brings us around to a point worth considering. When a man or company is dealing in an article for which there is a general demand, and cannot find a satisfactory outlet for his product, the chances are that the product itself is at fault, not that the trouble lies in market conditions, high salaries or any other outside influence or condition.

"The biggest things I have been driving at in my direction of the World-Brady pictures were (and are) the stoppage of waste, the systematization of production and the perfection of the output. We are now so far ahead that we could quadruple our releases if we so desired, or we could sit back and rest on our oars for five or six months entirely without inconvenience."

Demand for Miss Young's Pictures

The World Film Corporation's issuance of two new Clara Kimball Young photoplays and eight newly printed and re-edited re-releases appears to have been a particularly timely and happy thought. Miss Young had not previously been seen upon the screen in four months, and the World's announcement found an eager response. The corporation's exchanges have been flooded with demands for the entire series.

Alice Brady Completes "Loneliness"

"Loneliness," the World-Brady play upon which Alice Brady has been occupied in the star role since finishing "Bought and Paid For," is the work of Willard Mack, one of the most successful dramatists of the present time. Arthur Ashley is featured in the principal male role, and the cast also includes Justine Cutting, J. Clarence Harvey, Walter Green, Edward Langford and Edward Kimball. Harry Davenport is the director.

Gail Kane Too Pretty to Fine

Gail Kane, who was arraigned before a Long Island justice for speeding her automobile, and discharged because she was "too pretty to fine," is the star of the World-Brady photoplay, "The Scarlet Oath," soon to be released. The title bears no relation to what the motor cop said when his fair prey was snatched from him.

ROOSEVELT TALKS

Colonel Sees "Our American Boys in the European War" on Screen in New York—Then Addresses Audience

A private showing of "Our American Boys in the European War," which is being distributed by Triangle gratuitously for the American Ambulance Service, was given for Col. Theodore Roosevelt at the New York Triangle projection room on Saturday morning September 23. Col. Roosevelt was accompanied by his daughter, Mrs. Richard Derby, Dr. Derby, and a party of friends. After viewing the film which gives pictures of the work being done by Americans in France and Belgium Col. Roosevelt made the following address:

Really, I have got very little to say. The most important thing that a nation can possibly save is its own soul and these young men whose deeds we have been watching in the film today have been helping this nation to save its soul, and as a whole, the nation has been thinking of saving everything else except its soul. The nation has been preaching "Safety First." These boys have been thinking of the safety of the soul first. There isn't an American worth calling such who isn't under heavy debt of obligation to these boys for what they have done. We are under an even greater debt of obligation to them than the French and the Belgians are. I was just reading an hour ago a speech by Henry Clay in 1824, asking this nation at least to express its sympathy as a nation with Greece when the Greeks were suffering the last extremities of misery, of terror and horror in the effort to fight for great ideals, and in the speech Henry Clay said that he asked that this action be taken for the sake of Greece, for whatever support we could give to Greece—but to ask it still more for the sake of America, so that America should not shrink from doing its duty, should not prove false to its ideals. These men of the American Ambulance Field Service, these men of the American Aviation Corps have been true to American ideals and every American owes them a debt.

Above all, I wish to say that all Americans interested—as all good citizens should be—in the honor of America, in the performance of duty by America and in the obligations in international humanity, should do everything in their power to aid the work of the American Ambulance Field Service. We should not only support them in the work they are doing but should aid them in the extension of that work. Anyone who has had any part, direct or indirect, in that work has been rendering a great service and I am very proud that one of my blood should have helped in rendering service and I want to bespeak for our people all the support that can be given.

No nation is worth preserving if its young men have not in them the spirit that these young men whose deeds we have seen on the screen have shown and at least let us aid all that we can to render their work as efficient as possible.

I want you to remember that I ask the aid partly in the interests of humanity, partly for the sake of the French and Belgians, and particularly for the sake of our own souls.

MOROSCO MAKES STATEMENT

Denies in Letter to President Abrams of Paramount That He Predicted Motion Picture Is Doomed

Oliver Morosco, the theatrical and motion picture producer, has issued a denial to the alleged statements that were spread broadcast as having come from him, through a magazine, in which he was quoted as having predicted the ultimate doom of the motion picture and that it is waning at present. Mr. Morosco's denial comes in the form of an open letter to the motion picture industry and its allied interests, addressed to President Hiram Abrams, of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, distributors of the productions of the Famous Players, Lasky, Morosco and Pallas.

In his communication to Mr. Abrams, Mr. Morosco says:

I have carefully gone over the articles in the Green Book and a great many of the things quoted as coming from me staggered me quite a little. I do not believe the interviewer intended in any way to misquote me, but merely misunderstood me.

My article was based on the moving pictures, and I stated emphatically to the interviewer that I thought the future of the moving picture business would depend on the manner in which pictures would be made; that I thought the cheap class of moving picture films would not succeed as they had in the past, but that the high class, well constructed, well acted story would live forever; that I intended in our picture company to make our productions with as much merit and quality as I would the biggest production I made on the legitimate stage, and that I would fight my own moving picture company with my dramatic productions throughout the country not as an opposition but in the making of the same. In other words, that in the making of a play or the making of a picture, I would try to make one outdo the other in artistic endeavor.

I also said that the moving picture industry of the future would prove a "survival of the fittest." At no time did I intend to be quoted as saying that the high class picture, or the worthy picture was on the decline. How foolhardy that would be of me, when I am in the picture business, making pictures for the public; and if you will take one clause in the article referred to I think it undoubtedly speaks for itself; I quote as follows:

"There will be a place and a demand for photoplays containing good stories, good acting, fine production and all that goes to make a good picture, and it will be the companies and producers capable of giving these pictures that will survive."

Powell Starts New Production

With the completion and trade showing of his first feature, "Charity?" Frank Powell, president of the Frank Powell Productions, Inc., will immediately begin work on another large production.

It is Mr. Powell's intention to product pictures with a purpose—that is pictures which in addition to presenting a dramatic story of wide appeal have underlying that story and as a motivating power certain conditions existent today the country over which can best be brought before the public through the medium of the screen.

Creighton Hale and Sheldon Lewis will be starred in this new picture as will a woman star whose name has not been disclosed.

Hodkinson Manager of Paramount

Kenneth Hodkinson, a widely known figure in the motion picture industry, and son of William W. Hodkinson, director and former president of Paramount, has been appointed manager of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, by the directors of this distributing organization.

Mr. Hodkinson was born in Idaho and educated in California. He grew up with the motion picture industry.. His father, an exhibitor and exchange man during his youth, he naturally gathered the rudiments of the business at an early age. Six years ago he entered the employ of the General Film Company, at their San Francisco exchange, in a very minor capacity, advancing himself steadily during a period of three years to the position of assistant head booker.

It was at that time that his father organized the Progressive Motion Picture Company and the younger Mr. Hodkinson became the assistant manager of the San Francisco office. When his father came east, prior to the inception of Paramount, he was appointed manager of the Progressive organization and held that position until a year and a half ago, when he joined the Paramount forces in the capacity of secretary to his father, then the president. Upon the election of Hiram Abrams as president, Mr. Hodkinson was named assistant general manager, from which position he has been made manager.

Florida Feature Ready Soon

It is reported from Miami, Florida, that Walter Miller, who first gained screen prominence in Biograph pictures, has surpassed the form he has shown in his previous successes, in the Florida Feature Film Company's second five-reel production entitled "The Toll of Justice."

In this feature Mr. Miller is supported by Irva Ross, whose work was praised by the critics who viewed the Florida Feature Film Company's first production, "The Human Orchid."

Scene from "The Toll of Justice," a Florida Feature Film production

"The Toll of Justice" will be ready for release soon.

Mary Miles Minter is now working on "Tally," a multi-reel American-Mutual feature written by Director Kirkwood.

"The Combat"

Anita Stewart Is Feature of V-L-S-E Release. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE COMBAT," by Edward J. Montagne, is a melodrama containing the basic requirements for depiction in the large space of six reels and in addition it is a good play for Anita Stewart to feature in, which consideration is the greater in the face of a memory that goes back to her last picture on the V-L-S-E Program. "The Combat" deals with the characters and the melodramatic episodes, of which it embodies many, that appeal with such unfailing decisiveness to the motion picture public. There is much vivacious action and the scene shifts from one moment of dramatic conflict to another.

Ralph Ince's direction gives the play every advantage. There is one disadvantage and this is the reality of the scenes which show a man convicted of murder being led from his cell through "the little green door" which figures so largely, and so disgustingly in the newspaper reports of executions by the state of New York. The director even goes so far as to have the man strapped in the chair. This is all quite too ghastly to be included in any form of theatrical production and in the pictures, with their remarkable realism, it is twice ghastly.

These flashes are not necessary and the author, producer and distributer can offer no plausible excuse for their existence. It is sincerely hoped that they will be eliminated from the prints which are shown to the public before some board of censors or the public themselves raise justly indignant cries against such misuse of the screen's power.

In no other respect does "The Combat" lay itself open to serious criticism of an adverse nature. The picture is interest compelling and in many points throughout the six reels becomes intense. The action is attractively and convincingly framed. But nothing about the offering takes prominence of the acting of Miss Stewart, who is seen to marked advantage as Muriel Fleming, whose mother presses her to marry a prosperous lawyer named Phillip Lewis.

Muriel is married to Graydon Burton, whom she believes to be dead, but as this is a secret the girl finally gives way to her mother's desires. A crooked lawyer procures the marriage license and tries to blackmail Muriel. Burton makes an unexpected appearance and struggles with the crook and to save him Muriel shoots and kills Slade. Burton will give no information as to the woman who was known to be with him at the time of the shooting and Lewis, the district attorney, convicts him. Lewis is elected to the office of first executive of the state and at the last moment pardons Burton, though Muriel is forced to threaten her Governor husband with complete exposure before he grants the pardon. A quiet separation is arranged and Muriel returns to the man she loves, Graydon Burton.

In strong situations "The Combat" is abundant and the play is mostly convincing. Miss Stewart's performance is perhaps the equal of the one she rendered in "The Suspect," which, plainly stated, means that it is excellent. John Robertson and Richard Turner are, as individuals and supporters of the star, exceptionally good. Two other well acted parts are those interpreted by Virginia Norden and Winthrop Mandell. It is some few weeks since V-L-S-E has offered exhibitors a picture as good as "The Combat."

"The Vagabond Prince"

Triangle-Kay Bee Production in Five Parts Released October 22. Reviewed by George W. Graves

THIS romantic drama by J. G. Hawks, features H. B. Warner in a part to which he is exceptionally well suited—that of a satiated prince, who, longing for romance and freedom, leaves his palace and his affianced wife (affianced as a matter of state) behind and becomes a vagabond in distant lands. The story is hackneyed, especially its denouement, when the prince, become a king in his absence by the death of his father and the crown prince, is torn away from the girl he is on the point of marrying and is taken back to the little kingdom from which he wandered. After filling the royal seat for a brief period, Prince Tonio decides that if ruling over Bothalia is to exclude him from the kingdom of love, he will choose the latter kingdom. So, after a struggle with the existing powers, he returns to freedom and the girl.

The scenery used as backgrounds for the various sets is extremely beautiful, and in point of elaborate production, novel photographic effects, etc., there is nothing wanting. The subtitle settings are also of superior quality. H. B. Warner's pleasing and convincing acting, the efficient cast, and the magnificent production carry the picture in spite of the fact that it is a dreamy romance, hardly to be taken seriously. Dorothy Dalton is exceptional in her part and Roy Laidlaw, as the Bohemian who incites the prince to take to vagabondage and later comes to his rescue, handles his part well. The remaining names on the cast are Katherine Kirkwood, Charles K. French, J. W. McLaughlin, J. Frank Burke and Agnes Herring.

"Her Surrender"

Five-Reel Ivan Drama Features Anna Nilsson. Reviewed by George W. Graves

A CAST of capable players, headed by Anna Nilsson, presents this latest of Ivan Abramson's sociological dramas, which, although its plot lacks unity and its appeal is scattered, may be acknowledged as a drama which will please a large proportion of theater-goers. This interest is due to the general merit of the acting, and some of the situations, which are strong.

The cast is composed of the following familiar people: Rose Coghlan, William H. Tooker, Harry Springler, Wilmuth Merkyl and Frankie Mann. The latter's portrayal of a heavy role is one of the picture's chief stays. There are too many slips in the mechanical direction to call it effective, the management of situations being much better handled. The subtitles range from good to bad.

Anna Nilsson is always a favorite with the enthusiastic movie-goer, and her name is a recommendation for the picture which the exhibitor cannot afford to overlook. In the story she is Rhoda Cortlandt, a girl of gentle habits, who spends her spare time helping the poor. Her father, a wealthy manufacturer, becomes an enemy of her sweetheart's mother, Mrs. Stuyvesant, and the young people's marriage is put off. Clarice Lee, a girl of loose morals, has played on Mrs. Stuyvesant's sympathies and been taken into her home. Her amorous advances to Webster are ignored. As a result of her jealousy, she plots to discredit Rhoda. The latter, in her struggle with the man who is carrying out Clarice's infamous plan, sustains a dagger wound, from which the doctors decree she can only recover by an operation of blood transfusion.

Rhoda's sweetheart consents to give his blood, but her father will not hear of it, and asks that a man be advertised for. The person who is finally accepted is Burton Woodrow, formerly in Cortlandt's employ, who has just completed a prison term for stealing $250 from his employer. He did this in order to save his sick mother, and he is anxious to refund the stolen money. Burton has always secretly loved Rhoda, but does not know she is the girl he is saving until after the operation.

With Burton's blood in her veins, Rhoda's affections are transferred from Webster to him. Webster, realizing the strength of Rhoda's new love, forfeits his claim to her, although they are engaged. The old folks' difference is straightened out, Burton taken back into the factory, and all ends well for everybody saving Clarice, whose guilt is revealed.

"The Scarlet Runner"

Three Episodes of The V-L-S-E Series. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE Scarlet Runner" series maintains its average in interesting moments, acting and direction through the eighth, ninth and eleventh releases. Christopher Race has up to the eleventh episode been one of Dan Cupid's most efficient aids and as though by way of appreciation said Cupid brings Christopher face to face with the well known one and only girl. Race at the end of "The Missing Chapter" experiences some of the emotions—strange concoction of joy and pain that they are—described by the many love-gripped persons he helped.

Italy is the background for the action of "The Glove and the Ring," the eighth episode. Race meets a young Italian who has met with a disappointment in the love game. He has no further interest in life and would welcome an illness that would carry him off. Christopher decides that Baria needs both good air and some excitement so he invites the wan young man to acompany him on his return trip to England. While driving through the mountains they meet with an adventure. A young woman, the daughter of an exiled writer, is being kidnaped by secret service agents of her government. The girl is rescued after a fight with the police and Baria finds in her much that makes life seem worth while and he no longer pines for speedy departure from this world.

"The Gold Cigarette Case" tells of a young woman who is being held captive by her uncle and guardian, who is bent upon securing the combination to a strong box where the valuables of her estate are held. Race finds a gold cigarette case and through a photograph in it locates her [illegible] and then rescues the girl.

The eleventh episode is entitled "The Missing Chapter." The next episode of the series will supply the article referred to in the title. We here find Race in the employ of a rich widow. The widow likes the young Englishman and she is not backward about letting him know it. Of course, he finds his employment distasteful but there is a reward for every job and Christopher's reward comes when he meets a lady named Dorothy Herbert, who drives a racing car as though every trip was a cup contest. She is injured when the car plunges off the road. Blood transfusion is necessary and it is unnecessary to say that Race comes forward and offers to give some of his. The closing scene shows him in a haze of wonder as to whether or not he will ever see Dorothy again.

Earle Williams plays Christopher Race in his usual style. Edith Storey is the Dorothy Herbert we will, or at least we hope we will, see in the next and concluding [illegible] "The Scarlet Runner" series.

"The Torch Bearer"

Five Reel American Drama Featuring William Russell. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS latest Mutual Star Production, in which William Russell is introduced as a newspaper [illegible] sort, begins as a strong political play. One is led to expect a serious problem play by the first scenes, in which the situation is carefully introduced and the leading character described in detail, as an aristocrat by birth, a democrat by inclination, and incidentally the owner of a fearless newspaper out to defeat crooked politics. But after the introduction, the play turns to frank melodrama, which is either a disappointment or a relief according to the taste of the spectator. this play turns is an object of the spectator's pity, but not so much so as though the tragedy which sent him on the downward path had been treated with more skill and less resemblance to ever so many unconvincing melodramas offered to the patrons of the screen.

We have all seen before the political boss who is the secret owner of drinking places and houses of ill fame and who personally captures a woman he has seen but once before. Likewise we have have all seen the young wife who was lured to the villain's apartments by a promise that an advancement for her husband is under way and details are to be arranged at the meeting. But the fact that we have seen these things is not the worst of it. For the picture-goer to look for new situations is to put himself to pains as great as the scenario writer who seeks them. The real objection to these incidents is that they are wholly unreal and they do not make good fiction.

As a character study "Rummy" has some pleasant moments in store for audiences. It is not a picture that can be counted upon to make a marked impression with its viewers but we look for it to win favorable comment from the average picture fan. Wilfred Lucas is a splendid actor and he is good as the newspaper reporter who goes down hill after losing faith in his wife. However, it must be said that Mr. Lucas has been seen to better advantage in the past. He is too prone to play fast and loose with his scenes as the derelict and at times Rummy gives flashes of a vigor and a courage that give the lie not only to his supposedly broken state but his very appearance, ragged and shadowy as it is.

The story opens with some scenes showing a drink-sotten man traveling about from saloon to office in an attempt to borrow money. Then we are given the details of his disappointment, the tragedy which started him on his present unhappy journey. He married a girl with whom he had but a slight acquaintance because he sympathized with her when she was arrested as a woman of the streets. After his marriage he did well and while he was city editor of the "Herald" he found his wife in a notorious house, whither she had been lured by the political boss. He would not listen to her protestations and left her. Then Bayard started to drink. Later he is given some details for a sensational graft story and also he learns the truth about the boss and his little wife. In the closing scene he is reunited with the girl and he receives a position on the "Herald."

The direction is by Paul Powell. The settings are good and the photography is good. Also the details of general direction are commendable. Pauline Starke gives a faithful and effiective performance as the girl. William H. Brown as the impossible boss is deserving of praise; he is interesting. James O'Shea, Harry Fisher, A. D. Sears and Clyde Hopkins complete the cast. "Rummy" furnishes one with entertainment of an acceptable sort.

"Dulcie's Adventure"

Minter-American-Mutual Feature Released October 2. Reviewed by Arthur E. Curtis

A SQUIRREL, a greased pig and two white doves—and thereby hangs a tale.

That is the impression one gets from the opening scenes of the latest Mary Miles Minter play for Mutual, produced at the California American studios. And that impression is far from unpleasant, even though it is not of the spicy flavor of the strong pabulum presented by many dramas of the screen, sex and otherwise. Indeed, it is easy to imagine wholesome "Dulcie's Adventure" drawing more people and pleasing them better in the average town throughout the country than many dramas with more powerful stories.

Through the charm of little Mary Miles herself, the convincing work of Marie Van Tassell as the stern and aristocratic aunt, and the skill of Director James Kirkwood in presenting appealing scenes with the dumb actors mentioned, the first reels of the story are interesting though leisurely. The action crescendos in the latter reels and the climax of the church wedding—almost—the fire, the arrests, the embrace, stirs the interest to a vivid climax.

The good folk of small towns will like this picture better than city picture goers. The charm and youth of Mary herself, however, make a universal appeal, to city and country, men and women, alike.

Alan Forrest will arouse all the sympathy a forlorn lover can hope to, in spite of the fact that his garb is a bit too classy for that of a grocer's son. His work is convincing and his characterization interesting at every angle. It would be unfair to pass up the enumeration of the good players in this piece without mention of the freckled faced urchin who steals the greased pig. Sans the freckles he will be a great villain some day; with them, a great comedian.

The Story: Dulcie lives with her two aunts on an estate in the south. The family is aristocratic, though impecunious, and the aunt who rules the household forbids Dulcie to play with "common" children. That's why Harry Spencer, the grocer's son, gets into difficulties when he gives Dulcie a pet squirrel and attempts to fan the flame of the friendship which of course springs up. With the death of one of the aunts it becomes necessary to reimburse the family fortunes. The surviving aunt has married the other girl. The wedding is stopped by a fire in the church and in the following panic the duke or something is arrested for his dark past crimes. The grocer's son has crept to the wedding, uninvited, he rescues her from the fire, and the happy finish comes with a snap.

picture. For the rest, the old theme is set forth in a comedy spirit, largely due to Ullrich Haupt's farcical portrayal of Milton Vanderpool, the society man favored by the matchmaking mother. This becomes frank caricature, while the other roles are played seriously. Whether this introduction of farce into romance will injure or aid the play will depend on the temper of the audience. The burlesqued fop will undoubtedly get a number of laughs.

Marguerite Clayton is at her best as the heroine, Jane Galvin. Patrick Calhoun is well cast as the civil engineer hero, while John Cossar and Florence Oberle appear as the father and mother of the girl.

The Story: Jane Galvin is disgusted by the foppishness of Milton Vanderpool, whom her mother favors. She spends her time playing tricks on him. One day, while in the woods sketching, she meets John Barth, who is supervising an engineering project. She allows the young man to believe her the daughter of a washerwoman who lives near by.

Jane and the young engineer fall in love. Milton, discovering the fact, appeals to the girl's mother. But things are straightened out when John comes to the Galvin home to consult with Galvin, and discovers Jane's identity. The father is pleased with the young man's ability as a civil engineer, and when he learns the circumstances, is glad to have him for a son-in-law. His influence finally wins the mother's consent, and her former favorite is banished.

"The Common Law"

Clara Kimball Young in Robert W. Chambers Story. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE Common Law" is the first production offered by the new company which bears the name of the star, Clara Kimball Young. It is also the first Robert W. Chambers story to be picturized. In addition to both these facts one feels free to add that the picture is highly satisfactory from a standpoint of production, acting and the romance it unfolds has undergone but slight changes in its transfer from printed pages to screen.

"The Common Law" is to be released in seven parts and while we are not prepared to say that the story warrants all of this space for an effective telling, the public will find the picture interesting throughout. In speaking of the probable impressions of those who will see "The Common Law," one cannot refrain from remarking the volume of impressions this picture will make, for owing to the widespread popularity of the novel, the star, and the amount of advertising the picture itself has been given it is safe to say that the production will be a big box-office attraction.

Clara Kimball Young is an attractive Valerie West, the leading character in this story dealing with the romance between an artist and his model. She appeals in the role. Conway Tearle is Neville and he renders a fine character of support to Miss Young. This may also be said of Paul Capellani as Querida and the other members of the cast.

The most notable thing about "The Common Law" as a novel is that it made its way into the best-seller class. In the film version the romance is not quite the spirited and attractive tale it is as told in the style of the author. The picture makes the characters more real but in doing so it unfortunately only shows how unreal they actually are. Valerie, Neville, Querida and Rita are in the novel an engaging lot to be sure. In the picture they have their interesting phases but if they want to be more appealing their charms should be concentrated, too many distractions are bound to occur during seven reels.

Albert Capellani directed the production. The settings are appropriate and they are pleasing. The photography is good, though there are no striking lighting effects to enhance it. "The Common Law" is, to repeat, well produced and acted and it is interesting. Viewed by the exhibitor it assumes big proportions, but as an evening's entertainment it is, while pleasant, not extraordinary in any sense.

"The Quest of Life"

Famous Players-Paramount Drama in Five Reels Released Sept. 25. Reviewed by George W. Graves.

THE story of this picture has been constructed with a view to giving the spectator the novelty of becoming intimate with its stars—the far-famed dancing luminaries, "Maurice" and Florence Walton, entertaining him at the same time with a dramatic theme. In the story the two are dancers who win their way to fame, and thus some of the couple's famous dances are given, including the skating dance. These register very well on the screen and will easily captivate any of that vast throng of dance enthusiasts which we have in this country. Both of these exponents of the dance give a creditable performance, considering the fact that acting is not their profession. Florence Walton seems more at home in her part, however, than does her partner, who is stagey at times. The picture has been handsomely produced and well directed, and we think that its novelty will make an appeal to the public in spite of the rather unconvincing story. Julian L. Estrange, Royal Byron, Daniel Burke, Russell Bassett and Mrs. Wm. Bechtel are in the cast.

Florence Walton plays the part of a girl, born in unfortunate circumstances, who dances her way out of her environment. Before her rise to fame a doctor has informed her that, unless she goes to Arizona she will have but a year

She thinks she is indebted to Mapleton, her manager, for her life, as he has claimed to be the one who sent her to the sanitarium, and strange to say, Maurice, in the face of losing his sweetheart, does not speak for himself. Later when Mapleton gets the girl alone, he gloatingly confesses his deception and attacks her. At this moment Maurice enters. Ellen rushes to his arms, and the manager slinks off. As an epilogue, a beautiful costume dance is rendered by the artists.

"His Little Wife"

Three-Act Essanay with Gertrude Glover. Reviewed by Arthur E. Curtis

of Gertrude Glover causes interest to spring anew in the old, old story, just as it always does in real life.

The old cobbler is a splendid character as done by that white-haired veteran, Thomas Commerford. The manner in which the village shoemaker's role stands out in this play is only another proof that only old men should be cast in old men's parts. In the hands of a young man and his grease paint and false whiskers this role would have been worse than mediocre. As it is, it is one of the high lights of the play. The character of the boy's father is well done by Frank Dayton, who fits the part like a glove. Harry Beaumont is an earnest small-town lover.

The Story: Grace Bolton is the ward of the village cobbler and his wife. When she graduates from school Martin Willard, head of the school board and the town's leading merchant, offers her a position in his store. His son, Tom, returns from college and falls in love with Grace. Opposed by elders on both sides they elope. In another city Tom's funds run low and his father refuses to aid him because he married a "common clerk." There is nothing for the honeymooners to do but return home and separate. The little wife, humilated by the turn of affairs, broods for a time and when she can stand it no longer leaps from a high bridge into a river. The elder Willard and a friend, taking an evening walk, rescue the girl and when she calls for Tom, Martin Willard realizes the best solution of it all and brings his son to her side.

"The Flower of Faith"

Golden Eagle Feature With Jane Grey and Frank Mills. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE INTERNATIONAL FILM SERVICE feature release for October 2, is a production that seems destined to be popular with picturegoers. Burton L. King, who directed the production of this story by Charles T. and Frank Dazey, overlooked no opportunities to make it an appealing offering. The spectacular night scenes which he produced are striking and attractive to the eye and a strong interest attaches to them because of their direct relation to an event to which this story effectively advances.

"The Flower of Faith" tells of a young woman whose father is an itinerant evangelist. At the community where Ephram Judson is so warmly received, Ruth meets a handsome, manly fellow named Hugh Lee. There is a deep mutual attraction, but Ruth is shocked to learn that Hugh has no faith in God, in fact he does not believe there is a God.

The girl's young brother takes up with a set of worthless men of the town and in a poker game loses the money he was to take to a neighboring community and which belongs to the church. He then steals this same amount from the town grocer. He escapes, but with a bullet wound in his arm. Tom makes for Hugh's cabin and there confesses to him and begs him to bring Ruth. The grocer has gathered a number of men, among them the evangelist, and they discover the girl in Hugh's cabin. The people of the community are incited to action against Hugh by the grocer and the evangelist and according to the code of their country all the men gather and ride to the cabin to drive Hugh from the country. Upon finding Ruth there, she having come to warn him, they decide upon lynching.

The girl, whose faith is strong, kneels in prayer. An electric storm comes up and a flash of lightning strikes the tree to which the infuriated mob has hung the innocent man. The next moment the young boy arrives and his confession clears Hugh, who is now a believer and acceptable to Ruth.

Jane Grey and Frank Mills form a strong starring combination and both of the leading roles are played in excellent style. Percy Helton brings much of the skill he has shown on the speaking stage to the part entrusted to him. The scenes at night with the rapidly increasing number of men riding horses and carrying torches will thrill audiences.

The ending of the story which shows the tree being struck by lightning is of course within the realm of possible events, yet the mere fact that such an occurance was fervently prayed for by a sincere girl will make numbers who see this picture wink and smile at the incident. But even so, this takes nothing away from the element of interest which is present throughout the play. It is an admirably constructed play and to be perfectly fair one must compliment the authors and the director.

Embers." In fact Miss Frederick's work is the only thing which makes this a picture worth the while spent in viewing it. Her performance is truly and honestly wonderful.

If the scenario writer only quit when he reached the end of his story it would be a particularly good offering, even though it did not run more than a short four reels. But to conform with the conventionality of making the sinner pay, this play goes on with what is practically a new story after reaching a satisfactory conclusion. And the mistake the director made in having the wicked sister roll down a flight of stairs when her outraged husband shoots her would seem to be further proof that things were drawn out to the breaking point.

"Ashes of Embers" is the story of two girls who resemble each other only as to appearance. Laura believes she has a good voice and it is through her singing teacher that she meets a wealthy middle-aged bachelor and she marries him for his money. Her sister is sent to prison for a theft committed by Laura and again Agnes is called upon to suffer for Laura's wrongs when Benedict has a detective follow his wife and secure evidence for a divorce. For some much needed money Agnes impersonates Laura and divorce is avoided. Then Agnes marries the young man Laura has brought to the brink of ruin.

After this the young man again meets Laura, and not without filling the spectator with all manner of doubts as to his sanity, he is about to succumb to her charms once more when Agnes intervenes.

Joseph Kauffman directed the production. Mr. Kauffman has supplied no subtle touches to the author's artless development of the characters and incidents, but on the whole the direction is good. Earl Fox has a rather difficult part and as Leigh, the weak young architect, he in many scenes shows that he knew it was not an easy part to play. Frank Losee, Herbert J. Frank, Maggie Halloway Fisher and Jay Wilson complete the cast. The settings are good but the same cannot be said of the photography. Miss Frederick is the best interpreter of double roles we have ever seen. The fact that the story is not all that it should be will not interfere with the keen interest which the star's performance will arouse in most instances. For this reason "Ashes of Embers" is a picture worth seeing and there is little doubt of its ability to win favor with the public.

While the work of all the principals in the cast is above a high average, the play stands up and will wear on account of the power of its plot. The theme has but a few drops of sweet flavoring in it but the strength of the story and the solid work on the part of the players give it a grip on the spectator's interest which is not loosened until the last inch of film flits past. A play with a large percent of sorrow and trouble can get over if the plot has backbone and a well organized anatomy, such as this play has. But a sorrowful play with a jelly-fish story would be adding gloom to structural sadness.

As the farmer's daughter who feeds the chickens in shabby clothes and as the wealthy wife living in the shadow of her first unfortunate marriage, Winnifred Greenwood does splendid work. She is Claire and will gather and hold all the sympathies of the audiences. Her husband, George Field, maintains his reputation for convincing meanness. Edward Coxen as the wholesome business-man-hero is all that your women patrons—and men too—could wish him to be. Were it not for the fact that his false whiskers prevented, as they always do, a convincing characterization, Charles Newton would have been a fine old rampaging farmer. It is lamentable that whiskers have to grow on the screen, unless they also grow on the real visages interpreting the play. Whiskers are a stumbling block, not only in the above case, but in the case of the work of every other producing company.

The real rain scene is unique and well done. The scenes about the home of the hero and his splendid but persecuted wife are unusually attractive.

The Story: Claire, the abused daughter of a miserly farmer, marries Lewis Harding, who steals her from home for the sake of her money. Her father dies about the same time that her husband is arrested for bigamy and swindling crimes. Later, seeking business advice, she becomes acquainted with the hero, a very successful business man. Their married life is shadowed by the return of Harding, who extorts money from the woman on his promise to keep the secret of their marriage. Harding is discharged from the employ of the husband. He threatens to tell everything unless the wife reinstates him. In a struggle between the wife and Harding the later is killed by his own pistol. The husband discovers the body, is found there by the police and is saved from conviction for the murder only by the wife's confession.

"Through the Wall"

Six-Part Vitagraph Blue Ribbon Released Oct. 2 on V. L. S. E. Reviewed by George W. Graves

THE excellence of this picture shows that a complicated detective story can be rendered on the screen in such a manner that one can follow the plot with the same precision and with all the suspense he would encounter in reading the novel. All screen sleuth stories aim at this pinnacle of perfection, some approach it, but few actually arrive there. The celebrated story, "Through the Wall," by Cleveland Moffett, has been adapted to pictures by Marguerite Bertsch and produced by Rollin S. Sturgeon in a scientific and logical manner, great care being shown to detail, as of necessity in a play of this nature.

The story is replete with situations of immense force—in fact, the familiar old word "gripping" can be applied to every one of the six reels without any fear of overstatement. When, toward the end of the picture, the detailed explanation, or clearing up of the things until then held in mystery, takes place, it is remarkable that there is not the least trace of an anti-climax.

George Holt's portrayal of the "master criminal" will bring him no little fame. It is one continuous piece of forceful, dramatic realism. William Duncan as Coquenil, the detective, is also splendid. Nell Shipman and Webster Campbell have big parts in which they appear to a decided advantage. Others among the copious cast, not one of whom fails to impress, are Corrine Griffith, Anne Schaefer, Otto Lederer and George Kinkel.

At the outset of the story, Heidelmann, the master criminal, marries the wealthy Mrs. Kittredge, to gain control of her money. She is lost at sea, and her daughter, Alice, being a witness to her death, loses her memory by the shock. Heidelmann, disguising himself as another man, calling himself Groaner, makes the girl and other people think he is her father (in this role) while he, as Heidelmann, enjoys the fruits of the supposedly dead Alice's fortune. Martinez, the man who rescued Alice at sea, finds her (Groaner has put her to work in a restaurant), and Heidelmann, fearing Martinez may become dangerous, fiendishly preparing a string of evidence to convict Lloyd Kittredge, his son-in-law.

But he has reckoned without Coquenil the detective, who ferrets out the secret and is about to [illegible] to the chief at headquarters when word comes from powers higher up to release Heidelmann. on the water and leaves them to slowly drown, while he goes to attend the trial of Lloyd.

How Coquenil and the girl escape from their terrible death, how the detective assails his man in court, and the manner in which the criminal evades the law—by swallowing the contents of a poisoned ring, brings the story to a fast and (may we say) smashing finish.

"The Light that Failed"

Pathe Gold Rooster Play in Five Reels Released October 15. Reviewed by George W. Graves

WHEN there is an excellent story to work from, it always gives one delight to see that the picturization of a novel has not been impaired by faulty production and bad acting. In Rudyard Kipling's "The Light That Failed," we have a story splendidly adaptable to the requirements of the screen, and in Pathe's rendition of it, we have a photo-drama alive with dramatic situations, rich in story interest, and breathing the true Kipling atmosphere. The author's creation has not been cheapened, but dignified, by this screen version.

Hardly could a more appropriate and efficient star have been secured than Robert Edeson, whose acting is forceful and sympathetic. He plays the part of Dick Hedlar, a staff artist stationed in the Soudan, who rteurns to England to find himself famous. He meets Mazie, his childhood lover and renews his love to her. But Mazie believes she has talent and wishes to become famous herself before thinking of marriage, although she has been told that she lacks genius. Some time later, Mazie realizes the hopelessness of her determination, and, at the word of her professor, goes to Dick's studio to accept his marriage proposal. Mazie is horrified to find Dick in a compromising position with his model, Bessie, who is one of these creatures who "will stop at nothing to gain her ends." Dick has always totally ignored Bessie. The circumstance being entirely the model's fault, Dick later goes to explain, but Mazie refuses to see him.

Owing to a previous accident, the doctors inform the artist that it will only be a matter of a few months before he will become totally blind. Anticipating this calamity, Dick works with feverish haste to complete his masterpiece. Just as he gives this the finishing touch, the light fails. While he and his friend, Torpenhow, are out of the room, Bessie, filled with the hate of a "scorned woman," ruins the picture. Torpenhow and the other men in the house, keep this deed from Dick, who, as a last gift, sends his masterpiece to Mazie. Torpenhow visits the latter, who comes to a belated recognition of her injustice. They both hurry back to the artist's apartment, but find him gone. With his little white dog, Dick, in an extremely melancholy mood, has set out for the far East. The most pathetic part of the story ensues. After a long hunt on the part of Torpenhow and Mazie, the latter at last finds him and the lovers, in each other's arms, die on the desert.

Lillian Tucker does admirably with the role of Mazie. Jose Collins is appropriately cast as the spiteful model, and Claude Fleming is cast as Torpenhow. To Edouard Jose's masterful direction is to be charged the picture's realism.

"Fires of Conscience"

William Fox Drama in Five Reels Released September 25. Reviewed by George W. Graves

"THE Fires of Conscience" features William Farnum in a role that will prove popular with his host of admirers. The story, by Henry Christeen Warnack, presents a very good situation which is worked up to a climax of strength at the end of the fourth reel, at which point it comes to a satisfying conclusion. The picture would have been much more effective if it had finished there. Instead, it journeys on for the length of another reel, the last thousand feet consisting of a practically detached plot.

This picture has plenty of "go" to it, and in entertaining value measures well up to the average Farnum subject. A number of realistic scenes are introduced by way of the director's efforts, Oscar C. Apfel's direction, both mechanical and stage direction, being consistently good. Mr. Farnum is surrounded by a large cast, the most important members being Nell Shipman, Gladys Brockwell, H. A. Barrows, H. J. Herbert and William Burress.

George Baxter (William Farnum), an extremely impulsive person, discovers his wife in the company of a young man, Paul Sneed, whom he knows by experience to be a thoroughly low character, and shoots him while he is trying to escape across the lawn to his father's house. Paul's father, Judge Sneed, a close friend of George's father, witnesses his son's murder, but, appreciating George's justification, allows the latter to get away before the authorities arrive.

A keenly tense scene in "The Fires of Conscience."

Baxter takes refuge in the West, his wife dying soon after his departure. He finally falls in love with a girl of the region, who, gathering the truth from his attacks of conscience, persuades him to return East and surrender himself to the police. This he does, and is arraigned in court before the man whose son he killed. The judge, realizing the full force of "the unwritten law," and his own son's culpability, is instrumental in securing a verdict of "not guilty." Then Baxter returns to his sweetheart in the West, where an episode, with him in the role of sheriff, furnishes the material for the "tacked on" last reel.

Burt Publishing Company for the screen rights to Harold McGrath's well-known novel, "Pidgin Island." Harold Lockwood and May Allison will play the star parts in the Metro adaptation of this novel.

"A Diplomatic Romance," in which Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne are co-starred, will be released on the Metro program October 16. This five-part feature was produced under the direction of Mr. Bushman, who also made the screen adaptation of the story written by John C. Clymer and Hamilton Smith. Mr. Bushman and Miss Bayne are supported by a notable cast, which includes Henri Bergman, William Davidson, Helen Dunbar, Edmund Elton, Belle Bruce, Harry D. Blakemore, Mrs. La Roche, Liza Miller and Charles Fang. The feature is produced by the Quality Pictures Corporation for Metro.

John B. O'Brien, recently the director of Mary Pickford at the Famous Players studio, and before that associated with D. W. Griffith, has signed a long-time contract to direct exclusively for the Metro program at the Popular Plays and Players studio. Emmy Wehlen, the young Metro star, will be under Mr. O'Brien's direction in this new arrangement. Work will begin immediately upon a five-part feature called "Vanity," which was written especially for Miss Wehlen by Aaron Hoffman.

Mme. Petrova has begun work on the five-part feature, "The Orchid Lady," which is the second play she has written for herself. Mme. Petrova declares that a star can be, and should be, of invaluable assistance to her director in the making of the production, and has proved her own ability in this way by giving many suggestions for the betterment of the pictures in which she is working.

Olcott Resigns

Sidney Olcott, one of the best known directors in the country, has resigned from the Famous Players directorial staff.

During his engagement with the Famous Players, Olcott produced some of their most successful pictures, among them being "Madame Butterfly," and "Poor Little Peppina," with Mary Pickford; "Diplomacy," with Marie Doro; "Seven Sisters," with Marguerite Clark, and "The Smugglers," with Donald O'Brien. He also directed Hazel Dawn and, latterly, Valentine Grant, in the Irish epic, "The Innocent Lie." He has just coupled a Scotch story, "The Daughter of MacGregor," with Miss Grant.

Olcott is widely known as the globe trotting director. He was the first American director to produce a picture abroad. Incidentally he filmed the first five-reel production to be released. This was "From the Manger to the Cross," and was picturized in Egypt and Palestine.

Essanay Actress Dead

Camille D'Arcy, Essanay actress well known to fans throughout the country, died at the Robert Burns hospital, Chicago, on September 26. The veteran player succumbed to a rare disease, an infection that it is thought developed from bathing in the lake. She was an ardent swimmer and went bathing often during the summer. In some manner the germs of the disease entered her system. In private life she was Mrs. Loren Wilder, wife of Dr. Loren Wilder. The last picture in which Miss D'Arcy appeared, "The Prince of Graustark," will soon be released on the Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay program.

Sam Katz, of the Amalagamated Theaters Corporation of Chicago, was in Detroit a few days last week to purchase an organ to install in his proposed new theater on the west side, Chicago.

Universal's Verne Play Big Spectacle

Two Hundred Thousand Feet of Film Used in Making Universal Company's Big Feature, "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea"

On an elevator raised fifty feet from the ground at Universal City stood cinematographers Eugene Gaudio, Friend Baker and Milton Loryea of the mammoth production "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," while they filmed the scenes attending the grand entry into the Hindu city, of Prince Daaker and the officials of his household, accompanied by several hundred of the British soldiery, after whom swarmed some 500 swarthy men and women, residents of the city wherein many stirring events subsequently were to take place.

A good many of us will be glad to see Jules Verne's imaginative tale "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea" on the screen. Universal is making it with great care and much money.

These scenes, made under the direction of Stuart Paton, who has been at work upon this colossal film spectacle, the never-to-be-forgotten story of which was given to the world by one of the most renowned of the sons of France—Jules Verne—for more than a year, most of which time was spent in the Bahama Islands. There thousands of feet of the most remarkable film that has ever been made were taken upon the ocean's bed, Director Paton being assisted in the unusual work by Martin Murphy. Both director and assistant had many thrilling experiences in the submarine depths and in the wilds of the West Indies while making film.

The scenes at Universal City in connection with the grand entry into the Hindu community are most gorgeous. Prince Daaker and his followers, richly garbed in the beautiful gowns of the Far East, trimmed with costly laces, wearing jewels in profusion and attended by the wealthy citizens of the city, arrayed in silken robes of all the colors of the rainbow, made the scenes especially attractive.

Elephants and camels carried the Prince and his immediate followers, and the others rode on horses. The soldiers of Britain, in their bright red coats, and the several bands which led the Oriental cavalcade rendering martial music, gave an additional interest to the dazzling scenes.

It was at the orders of H. O. Davis, Vice President and General Manager of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, that H. H. Barter, Technical Director, constructed the attractive buildings for the Hindu city most substantially and with the view of securing the best results photographically. Director Paton has had several thousand feet of the film that was taken of the street scenes projected, and all those who were fortunate enough to see it have expressed themselves as delighted with its appearance on the screen.

"Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea" will not be completed for several months, and when it is released undoubtedly will create a sensation. One hundred and fifty thousand feet of film—150 reels—were made in the West Indies, and fully 50,000 feet—50 reels—will be added to it by the time the filming is completed at Universal City. Out of this 200,000 feet, not more than 12,000 feet, or twelve reels—the very best of the vast footage—will be used finally, the company thereby planning to give the film-loving public one of the greatest treats the cinematographic art yet has developed.

Goodby, Melodrama

In "The Parson of Panamint" and in "The Intrigue,"—Miss Lenore Ulrich's new photoplay for Pallas Pictures—are to be found evidences of the perfection toward which the Pallas-Morosco Companies have been aiming; namely, to present to Paramount patrons photoplays that grip, without resorting to cheap melodrama. Needless to say that the day has come when cheap thrills will no longer satisfy the public, whose tastes are constantly becoming more discriminating. The Pallas-Morosco authorities foresaw this day—realized that photoplays were drawing a new clientele of people of refined tastes, and have been aiming at this goal for a period of at least two years. Now at last in the opinion of many of the Paramount exchange managers who have viewed the above pictures recently, these Paramount producers are coming into their own.

In both the "Parson of Panamint" and "The Intrigue," it would be well for exchange managers and exhibitors to watch the Pallas-Morosco work very closely, because it will be found by those who are appreciative of good dramatic construction that the tone and character of the photoplays of these companies are constantly being improved—a condition which will unquestionably be reflected in the receipts of the exhibitor of these pictures.

PLAYS THE SCIENTIST

The reason why the figure of Dr. Montrose, in "The Crimson Stain Mystery," the sixteen-episode serial presented by Consolidated Film Corporation, stands out so vividly is because it is interpreted by no less an artist than Thomas J. McGrane.

Thomas J. McGrane, [illegible] in Consolidated's "Crims[illegible]"

Having a foundation of six years with David Belasco, Klaw & Erlanger and William A. Brady, Mr. McGrane has brought to "The Crimson Stain Mystery" a world of experience in just such roles as he is now portraying. His masterful handling of the strange situations in which the role of Dr. Montrose plays a part is one of the many pleasing features of the serial. His remarkable interpretation of his difficult part has called forth praiseworthy comments from the motion picture critics.

Lone Star Corporation—There are reports in Chicago and New York to the effect that a retirement of 25 per cent of the preferred stock at 110 may be expected at an early date and also that dividends will be announced at the same time. This should result in a demand for both issues. Most of the trading during the past week has been in the Lone Star securities.

McClure Picture Corporation—Has secured some of the most prominent stars in the photoplay industry. With the unusual publicity that can be effected through the McClure Magazine and other new lines that will be followed out, coupled with a very strong organization on the factory side, the trade expects this company to score heavily at the very outset.

American Film Company, Inc.—Dividend disbursements, which were interrupted in order to finance, out of its own earnings, the "Secret of the Submarine" and other serial pictures, are expected to be resumed this fall.

Mutual Film Corporation—Economies connected with the management in its new Chicago quarters verify the judgment of the company in moving its offices from New York. As a large part of the real production in the film industry takes place on the western coast, the mere fact of Chicago's proximity thereto and the greater ease with which the company's officials can get in touch with the actual conditions, would alone demonstrate why Chicago has earned its reputation for being the logical center of the film industry.

New York Motion Picture Corporation—Has continued weak for the past month and a half. Offerings are freely made, but buyers difficult to secure.

role in the Lockwood-Allison company under Henry Otto's direction.

Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., and a party of friends visited the Triangle-Keystone studios last week. Mrs. Vanderbilt did her "bit" before the camera and came back next day to see how she looked. The director promised to engage her for a role whenever she wished.

Arthur Friend, counsel for the Jesse L. Lasky Company, New York City, has arrived at the Lasky studio in Hollywood for a brief vacation and for conference with Samuel Goldfish, chairman of the board of directors.

Fred Peck, the insert-writer of the Ince Triangle studios, finds his newspaper training a valuable aid. At present he is preparing, for use in William S. Hart's current play, a number of copies of "The Glory Hole Nugget," purporting to have been in use in 1878, and is turning out the sheets on an antiquated handpress.

The announcement is made of the marriage of Reggie Morris, prominent in Mack Sennett-Keystone comedies, and Miss May Repetto, daughter of a wealthy St. Louis tobacco man.

Dr. R. Ralston Reed, whose photodrama, "Witchcraft," won the prize in a contest held under the auspices of Columbia University and the Lasky Feature Play Company, is on his way to visit the Lasky studios. The prize offered for the best scenario written by a member of the photodramatic class, included a trip from New York to the studio in Hollywood as the guest of the Lasky Company.

Robert L. Todd has been placed in charge of the cutting of the Harold Lockwood and May Allison Metro plays. Before joining the Metro-Yorke studio, Todd was affiliated in a similar capacity with the Lasky, Horsley and L K O studios.

"The Roses Have Nothing on You," is the title of a song written by Ernest B. Orne and Howard T. Googins, dedicated to Margarita Fischer of the Mutual-Pollard pictures. This is the third song dedicated to Miss Fischer, the first being "That Moving Picture Girl."

Little Mary Sunshine, the Balboa baby star, appears as a shipwrecked orphan waif in her next picture, and she is the central character of various adventures. Henry King, who directs, also has an important role.

Neva Gerber is to play the feminine lead in a second Universal picture directed by Lois Weber, with Ben Wilson opposite.

May Allison, who has a lyric soprano voice, was once ambitious to be a grand opera prima donna. When eighteen years old, she wrote a light opera and played the leading role at a production given by amateurs in her home town. On the stage, her first role was in the Henry W. Savage production of "Everywoman," in the part of "Vanity." She later played with Ina Claire in "The Quaker Girl"; with De Wolfe Hopper in "Miss Caprice," and had the leading role in "Apartment 12."

A representation of an art gallery in a large city forms one set in the Fox play in which Frank Lloyd is directing Gladys Brockwell. Many well-known paintings have been borrowed from Los Angeles art lovers for its walls.

Charles Hill Mailes, whose home is located on the side of a mountain, has troubles of his own keeping his pet Irish terriers from encounters with rattlesnakes, "chiggers," burrs, wild holly thorns, etc. He has been obliged to build a special pest-proof runway for them.

Walter Moore, vice president of the H. C. Miner Lithographing Company of New York City, who accompanied Samuel Goldfish to the coast with the view of establishing a branch lithographing plant out here, has returned to New York City and will lay his report before the other heads of the lithographing organization. Mr. Moore said before he left that he felt the necessity of having a branch in Los Angeles to take care of the enormous Pacific coast business.

In the comedy, "A Lover's Might," the Keystone studio cat plays a very important role. In a fire scene, "Tabby" lies quietly on a bed, with flames leaping around, until rescued by Julia Fay, the heroine. Many weeks were taken to train the cat so that it would not become frightened and run away.

A number of scenes in the Selig play, "The Garden of Allah," will be filmed in the walled private garden of the Santa Barbara Mission, which has never before been used by a picture company.

May Allison is especially pleased with her role of the southern girl, "Isabel Malvern," in the Metro-Yorke picturization of Marie Van Vorst's novel, "Big Tremaine," for Miss Allison is herself a southerner, having been born on a plantation in Georgia.

Bessie Barriscale is playing in another light comedy part under the direction of Charles Miller. The story is by C. Gardner Sullivan.

James L. Farley, who had a prominent role in the Signal serial, "The Girl and the Game," featuring Helen Holmes, is now playing in a feature under Frank Lloyd at the Fox studios.

Edythe Sterling, who has played in Signal and Universal features and who was formerly on the speaking stage, was the first player engaged to support Tyrone Power in "The Planter," most of the scenes of which will be taken in South America.

Myrtle Stedman, who has been resting since the completion of "The American Beauty," will soon begin work on a new Pallas-Morosco feature. She is working over her story, consulting producer and management and studying her part.

Fred J. Balshofer, president and general manager of the Yorke and Quality Film Corporation, says of photoplays: "Proper cutting of pictures is just as essential as good stories, photography, or casts. No matter how good a story is, if it fails to contain simplified continuity, and if the chief characters are not brought in front of the audience often enough you are just as far from having a successful photoplay as though you were dealing with a poorly constructed theme. On the other hand, you can improve the quality of a poor story, with good cutting and subtitles."

Gilbert P. Hamilton, the Century Company's managing director, dropped off at Billings, Montana, on his way east with the eight-reel feature, "Inherited Passions." He gave a private showing of the film to some Billings magnates and it is possible that the Century Company may make Billings its future headquarters. Mr. Hamilton is now in New York arranging business connections.

Thomas Chatterton, who usually plays heroic roles, is revealing his talent as a comedian in a juvenile role with Kolb and Dill at the American studios.

The two little sons of Cameraman Antonia Gaudio, Francis, six, and Antonio, Jr., four, made their debut as screen actors in scenes for "Mister 44," the latest Allison-Lockwood feature, which their father photographed at the Metro-Yorke studios in Hollywood.

William Ephe, who played with Harold Lockwood in Selig and American plays, has a good acting part in "Big Tremaine." He is "David Tremaine," who leads a life of indolence, gambles secretly and thus squanders the allowance his mother gives him. This brings him into trouble which Lockwood, as the brother, takes upon his own shoulders and suffers for him.

William De Vaull, the character actor, who played in "The Birth of a Nation" and in the new Griffith spectacle, "Intolerance," has been engaged by Director Henry Otto to characterize the role of "John Nolan" in the Metro-Yorke production of "Big Tremaine." De Vaull did some of his best Triangle work with Lillian Gish in "An Innocent Magdalene," with Douglas Fairbanks in Bret Harte's "The Halfbreed," and with Helen Ware in "Cross Currents."

In "The Star of Hope," the prison newspaper of Sing Sing, Prisoner No. 64,791 pays a tribute to motion pictures in the following description of the film play. "I am the touchstone of truth. I am justice, for I disclose injustice. I make the greedy become generous. I make the inmates of prison see the error of their ways and give them hope and courage to lead better lives. I sow in men the seeds of ambition. I am a source of Joy both to prince and pauper. I bring solace to the aged and sorrowing."

Thousands of revellers at Coney Island Brighton Beach were thrilled by an unexpected spectacle when an entire Mexican town, constructed in the center of the Brighton race track was burned to the ground to obtain some sensational night scenes in the making of "The Brand of Cowardice," an all-star five part Metro production. Lionel Barrymore and Grace Valentine are being starred. John W. Noble is directing this spectacular production.

Louise Huff has gone into training for the role of Jane in the Famous Players adaptation of Booth Tarkington's celebrated novel "Seventeen" in which she is to appear with Jack Pickford. It will be remembered that Jane's chief delight is to fame lay in her unlimited consumption of bread, applesauce and sugar. As any one thing which Miss Huff cannot do is applesauce and the producing lady is now hard at work trying to eat it without making a face before the camera.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by makes, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

An Indian's Loyalty—Biograph Re-Issue—October 2.—Featuring Lillian Gish, Edward Dillon and Eagle Eye. The Young foreman and the ranchero's daughter are in love and when an Indian, who is employed on the ranch, is discharged by the ranchero who accused him of stealing money, which was stolen by a farm hand, the foreman who has taken a liking for the Indian, has him reinstated. The foreman, who is suspicious of the farm hand, discovers him looking in the window of the ranchero's house. He is discharged and, bent on revenge, he goes after one of his pals. They capture the ranchero's daughter and insist that she tell them where her father's money is. The Indian returning from the field for a farm implement and hearing the noise inside, looks in and sees the girl struggling with the men. He goes for help and when the men arrive a terrific struggle ensues, ending with the capture of the outlaws.

In the House of the Thief—(Three Reels)—Selig—October 2.—Featuring Eugenie Besserer, Vivian Reed and Charles West. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

An Old Fashioned Girl—(Two Reels)—Essanay—October 3.—Featuring Marguerite Clayton and Patrick Calhoun. Jane Galvin objects to the society idler her mother has selected to be her husband. Her father is secretly delighted that she spurns Milton Vanderpool. He takes her to a fashionable resort in the mountains. There, while walking, she meets John Barth, a young civil engineer. She falls in love with him, but conceals the fact that she is wealthy. Barth is similarly affected, but believes he a poor mountain girl. Mother and Milton come to the hotel and the girl can no longer steal away to see the engineer. Some days after she sees him with her father. The latter is approving of his work for him and signing a new contract. The daughter indicates that she, too, would willingly sign a contract with the engineer and father is delighted. Mother is finally won over, too.

The Fable of the Kid Who Shifted His Ideals to Golf and Finally Became a Baseball Fan and Took the Only Known Cure—Essanay—October 4.—A messenger kid stopped to gaze at a picture of Jess Willard in a window as he began to weep bitterly. A soft-hearted commuter halted. "Why do you weep" he asked. "Aw, gee, what chance have I to ever be like him," came back the Tadpole. "What a perverted ambition! Why don't you strive to be like me? I am a candidate for director of our new four-hole golf club and I play whist on the train with a man who once lived in the same house with Billy Sunday." So the boy became a caddy and listened to the poor nuts who babbled about tough lies and dubbing approaches and reflected that they were much inferior to his own dad, who had to shove lumber all day while these superficial Johnnies had money to toss to the birds. When the Kid reached the age of sagacity he became a baseball fan. His wife never knew what the fan was talking about, but she helped him into the house and mixed his throat gargle for him. Then the fan came to his ninth inning. She pleaded for one final message. His lips moved. She leaned forward. Fan wanted to know if there was anything in the morning papers about the condition of Heinie Zimmerman's knee cap.

Moral—There is a specific bacillus for every classified disease.

Under the Gaslight—Biograph—October 4.—Featuring William Russell, Irene Howley and Millicent Evans. Judas, the Courtland family servant, discharged for stealing, and eager for revenge, substitutes her baby for the Courtland infant. A few years elapse and Pearl, Judas Byke's daughter, is raised as the Courtlands' child, while Laura, the Courtland child, is brought up by the Bykes and taught to steal. She is caught stealing in the Courtland home and they adopt her after making a money settlement with Byke. Laura and Pearl are about twenty when the Courtlands die, leaving their fortune equally divided between the two girls. Byke plans to blackmail Laura and sends her a note, which Pearl reads, and later she tells Ray Trafford, Laura's sweetheart, with whom she is in love, Laura's story. Ray writes Laura that he loves her even though her parents are of low origin, but the note never reaches her, because Pearl keeps it. Later, however, Blossom, the girl who cared for the Byke child at the time of the substitution, tells that Laura and not Pearl is the Courtland child and all ends happily.

His Little Wife—(Three Reels)—Essanay—October 7.—Featuring Harry Beaumont and Gertrude Glover. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

The Canbyhill Outlaws—Selig—October 7.—Featuring Vicky Fords and Tom Mix.—The Canbyhill outlaws terrorize the country for a long time, owing to the sheriff of the county being lax in his duty. Tom Gordon, the deputy, decides to capture Bill Tracy and his gang. Tom is in love with Vicky Miller and tells her that he will bring back the gang. The sheriff, Jim Grant, is also in love with Vicky. He plans to get word to Tracy and his outlaws that Tom is after them. Vicky becomes suspicious and overhears the plot. She follows the messenger into the hills and is captured by the gang. Tom finds her hat, follows the trail and rescues the girl. Tom then overcomes the outlaws and finds a note on the leader, from the sheriff, warning the outlaws of Tom's plan to capture them. Tom, after jailing the outlaws, goes to the sheriff. That officer sees him coming, and shoots at Tom, but misses. Tom locates the shot, shoots and drops the sheriff. He then goes to Vicky's home and tells her of the sheriff's double cross.

Mutual Pictures

Slicking the Slickers—Beauty—October 5.—Featuring Orral Humphrey. Barney, one of the gang of bunco men, puts over a slick deal and gets quite a roll of money, but his pals "frisk" him of it. He plans revenge and enlists the aid of Gertie, one of the gang. Disguised as a Rube, he allows himself to be trimmed by the gang in a card game and says he will have to sell his farm to get money to continue the game. Gertie tells the gang she is acquainted with the Rube and that, unknown to him, there is oil on the land. They offer the Rube the money they have won and he sees. Upon inspection of the farm they fail to find any trace of oil. Rube and Gertie drive up to them in a new roadster and the fellows accuse Gertie of doublecrossing them. Rube removes his disguise and they recognize their old pal, Barney, and he introduces Gertie as his wife.

A Touch of High Life—(Two Reels)—Vogue—October 8.—Featuring Paddy McQuire, Arthur Moon and Gypsy Abbott. Paddy McQuire, a street sweeper, meets stylishly dressed Arthur Moon, who has started for a week-end at the beach, but has dallied too long in the corner saloon. Paddy, seeing his plight, takes Arthur to his room to sleep it off. Moon gives Paddy his wallet and tells him to have a good time. Paddy puts on his best suit and starts for the beach. He meets Moon's sweetheart here and, calling her to one side, explains that she must carry out the deception to save Moon from further trouble and she agrees. All the young men at the beach become jealous of Paddy, who monopolizes the society of the girls. His good time comes to a sudden end when Moon appears upon the scene and denounces Paddy as an imposter.

Universal Program

Borrowed Plumes—(Two Reels)—An Episode of "Timothy Dobbs, That's Me"—October 2.—Carter De Haven featured. After taking and losing a job as cashier in a small theatre, Timothy sees a chance to don girls' clothes and go to the studio thus attired—as it seems girls are much in demand. He has a fine time flirting with the directors, but soon comes to grief, his wig coming off. Timothy is chased by the angry directors, as well as by the owner of the stolen clothes and her sweetheart. The last we see of Timothy he is attired in his B. V. Ds.

With the Spirits' Help—Nestor—October 2.—Eddie Lyons, Lee Moran and Priscilla Dean featured. The love affair of Joe and Emily progresses nicely until a professor, who claims to have control over spirits, comes to town. Father quickly decides that Emily had better wed the professor. During a seance the young people attempt to elope, but luckily they are taken for spirits by the spook-hunting assembly, including the professor, who is a fake. At the sight of Joe, who has been hiding in a flour barrel, the whole crowd takes to its heels. Forgiveness and a wedding follow.

In the Heart of New York—(Three Reels)—Gold Seal—October 3.—Ben Wilson is cast as Hugh Van Dyke, a wealthy bachelor, who disguises himself as a character of the slums in order to spy on some crooks who have robbed him. He comes to the rescue of Rose Grey, a well-to-do girl who is doing settlement work, and their friendship grows into love, in spite of the man's apparent poverty. Finally Hugh obtains evidence which results in the gang's arrest, he returns to his former life and becomes engaged to Rose, although she makes him pay for his deception.

Safe in the Safe—(Two Reels)—L-Ko—October 4.—Featuring Dan Russell. In this riotous comedy a police commissioner, a chief of police, a gang of crooks and some pearls figure. The chief, who is as bad as being in league with the gang, is made to understand by the commissioner that he is to recover the stolen pearls or lose his job. Disguised as a woman, the chief is well on his way to accomplish this when his wig falls off. Then a mad chase ensues, which comes to an abrupt end when the chief's auto falls from a bridge. After his fall the latter has just enough energy to say his prayers before passing away.

The Eternal Way—Big U—October 5.—Fea-

New Cub Mutuals on the way. From the left, "Won by a Fowl," "That Wonderful Wife," and "Oh, for a Cave Man." All will appear the first week in October.

turing G. Raymond Nye and Vola Smith. Because of an indiscretion on Vola's part, her lover is lead to believe that a man named Bill is deceiving her. Bill is really in love with Vola's sister, May, which fact finally becomes evident in time to prevent a killing.

Pen and Inklings In and Around Jerusalem—Powers—October 5.—This is a combination cartoon by Hy Mayer and travel picture of Palestine, the moving picture being stopped at times and Mr. Mayer's cartoon being faded in. The famous Wall of Wails, a sacred parade, the well into which Joseph was cast by his brethren and the place of Jesus' nativity are shown.

Somewhere on the Battlefield—(Two Reels)—Universal Special—October 6.—Hobart Henley and Claire McDowell. Somewhere near the Servian fighting line is an improvised hospital. Dr. Kovis Miklos, a physician at the place, falls in love with Emma, a nurse. It later turns out that Kovis is a Servian spy. Wounded, he seeks help from Emma, who tries her best to ward off his captors, in spite of her disappointment. She, believing his wound is only slight, tries to deceive the soldiers into believing he is dead. When his captors have left, and she thinks she has won a victory, she is stunned to find that he really is dead.

A Charming Villain—Victor—October 6.—Billie Mason and Madge Kirby featured. Billy, a social wolf, makes violent love to Sis, runs off with her to the city, and arranges a mock marriage in order to get her money. Jim, father's choice, gets wind of the elopement and is told by the father that if he rescues her he can have both her and the money. Jim is almost successful, but, contrary to precedent in motion picture plots, the girl rejects her rescuer and marries the villain.

A Mountain Tragedy—(Two Reels)—Bison—October 7.—Zoe Rae is featured as a little mountain girl, who saves her mother from a ruffian who attacks her in her mountain home. Because Mrs. Prentiss will not go with the ruffian, Monte, he decides to kill her, for he has a grievance against her husband. An interrupted phone call alarms Prentiss and he sets out for home. Just as the coward is about to shoot the helpless woman her child hits the man in the eye with a beanshooter. Before he can recover the gun the wife has covered him. Then Prentiss arrives and takes Monte into custody.

Father Gets in Wrong—Joker—October 7.—This picture shows how Father decidedly "gets in wrong" when he falls in love with the same girl he and his wife are trying to keep away from their son. Such a compromising position does Father get into that he is glad to sanction the young people's marriage if they will only keep his affair from Mother.

The Human Gamble—(Two Reels)—Rex—October 8.—With Dorothy Davenport and Emory Johnson. A rather novel situation occurs in this picture when a daughter becomes her father's bitter rival in business. Years before the father, John Hill, a stock broker, had disowned his son, and the daughter had left with him. The daughter's husband, Hill's financial opponent, being ill, she takes his place. Things finally come to a point where the girl is torn between duty to her father and love for her husband. She at last desides to save her father, which act not only brings about a reunion in the family, but also brings its financial returns.

Liberty's Sacrifice—(Two Reels)—Seventh Episode of "Liberty"—September 25.—Word from Washington prevents the troops from going any further on their mission to save Liberty, who has been taken into the mountains by her captors. Finally, Bob and Pedro set out by themselves to see if they cannot find Liberty and devise some way to effect her escape. But the two men, on nearing the Mexican's camp, try to do a little spying and get too reckless. They are discovered by the enemy and what resistance they can put up is of little avail. They are captured and led away to the mountains with Liberty.

The Bigamist—Imp—September 25.—Featuring King Baggot and Jane Vernon. John Talboys is disinherited by his father. He leaves for Australia, determined not to return until he can provide his wife with the luxuries she craves. She, greatly relieved at his departure, changes her name and marries Sir Michael, a widower. John, having "struck it rich," returns home, and later discovers the whereabouts of his wife. She meets him at an old well and pushes him into it. But John is not killed. Later, when he confronts her, she dies of the shock.

The Injustice of Justice—Laemmle—September 25.—Luigi, a poor Italian, steals a little coal to keep his little daughter warm, and is caught. The judge has no mercy and commits the man to jail. When Luigi is freed, he goes to the judge's house with the intention of killing his little daughter. But to his surprise he finds that the judge has adopted his own child. This of course leads to an adjustment, and Luigi is given work.

Dark Corners—Rex—September 25.—The scene is laid in India. An idol is stolen, and the high priests ask the aid of an American detective in recovering it. After a long period of searching, the detective locates the idol in a cavern, the haunt of a dangerous band of thieves, whose head is a beautiful girl, the most desperate of them all. The sleuth gets what he is looking for, but is discovered and cast into the darkest part of the cave. However, he escapes by a trap door and returns the idol to the apprehensive high priests.

A Surgeon's Revenge—(Two Reels)—L-Ko—September 27.—Featuring Billie Ritchie—Dinty flirts with a doctor's wife, but manages to escape punishment at the hands of the physician, who discovers him. Later Dinty takes the wife for a ride in the doctor's car, smashing the latter. He is found in the hospital by the doctor and it looks as though the latter were to have his pound of flesh, when Dinty escapes once more. But the culprit is at last caught in the doctor's own house, where he receives punishment commensurate with the enormity of his crime. The moral of this film is, "If you must flirt, pick out the wife of a cripple."

E. H. SOTHERN IN FILM DEBUT AT STRAND

Famous Actor Appears in Star Role of "The Chattel"—Academy of Music Offers Gala Anniversary Bill—Others.

E. H. SOTHERN, the famous actor, made his debut as a screen star at the Strand Theatre yesterday afternoon in "The Chattel," the first of three pictures in which he has acted before the camera for the Vitagraph Company of America. The importance of Mr. Sothern's debut in the "movies" was sufficient to warrant the largest audience that ever crowded its way into the Strand. Mr. Sothern's work was applauded as vigorously as if he had been there in person rather than in shadow.

"The Chattel" is a strong play, and gives Mr. Sothern a capital role. It is presented in five reels, and is head and shoulders above the average "five reeler." The settings are unusually lavish, and the surrounding company is excellent. This may especially be said for Peggy Hyland, whose work in the emotional moments of the film play was second only to that of Mr. Sothern.

The play proved an admirable vehicle for Mr. Sothern, and if the two promised ones prove to be of the same calibre it is more than likely that the distinguished actor will be prevailed upon to do at least several others.

Another Strand

The Proof

PUBLIC OPINION—the Court of Last Appeal—has acclaimed the triumph of Greater Vitagraph productions.

Notwithstanding the car strike in New York City, more than 15,000 people—the largest audience in the history of the wide-famed Strand Theatre—crowded its way into that house on the first day of the initial showing of "The Chattel," in which E. H. Sothern, America's foremost actor, made his screen debut.

This notable production, which is but one of a list of supreme offerings available to exhibitors through the Greater Vitagraph, was also selected by the management of the magnificent new Stillman Theatre, Cleveland, after a canvass of the output of the entire field, as the one picture worthy of the opening of this theatre.

Thus has every claim of the enormous public interest in the film appearance of Mr. Sothern been proved by actual results to the exhibitor.

And thus may exhibitors at all times demonstrate by actual test the claims made for Greater Vitagraph productions as a whole

Powerful Members for Association

FIGHT AGAINST CENSORSHIP STILL BEING WAGED THROUGHOUT COUNTRY

IF you are not in the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry you are not in the industry, is an idea which is taking fast hold of everyone in any way connected with the motion picture industry. Since the definite stand taken by the organization against any and all forms of legalized censorship a number of new and powerful members who had been waiting for a pronouncement on this very question, decided to become a part of the great trade organization. These include the Mutual, Triangle, Fox, Kalem, Thanhouser, Pathe, Wharton, Inc., Crystal, Cosmofotofilm and the Kinecartoon. David Wark Griffith, whose address on censorship was one of the features of the gathering that unanimously decided against it, has also taken an individual membership.

The applications are coming in from all sections of the industry and the team work of the boosters, both by word of mouth and by correspondence, has been productive of the most gratifying results. The various meetings have been marked by enthusiasm and a constructive purpose that acts at once to reach accomplishments.

Supplies Branch Organized

There was a luncheon meeting at Shanley's, Forty-third street and Broadway, on Wednesday last when the Equipment and Supplies Branch discussed the necessity of organizing its particular branch of trade into a country-wide organization, which would deal, through the national association, with some of the problems that sorely press the dealer at present. There were present E. S. Porter, of the Precision Machine Company; E. Kendall Gillette, Walter J. Moore, of the H. C. Miner Lithograph Company; J. H. Hallberg, of New York; Fred Hawley, of the Motion Picture Directory; J. F. Coufal, of the Novelty Slide Company; and William M. Seabury, general counsel of the association, who gave legal guidance regarding the proposed organization, its purposes, its interrelation with the central body and the co-operative and protective limitations.

It was made clear that a better understanding between all branches could only be brought about by frequently getting together, with plain speaking as to grievances and things to be remedied—to get the other fellow's point of view and let him learn yours. In fact, to know one another as one big, harmonious family—not as a trade sentiment, or more amiable altruism, but as a sound principle of a great industry in the building of which to impressive permanence every bit of mechanism should receive the closest and most sympathetic attention.

The Equipment and Supplies Division is the third of the big sections to organize and the date of its general meeting for that purpose has been fixed for Wednesday, October 4, at 2:30 p. m., at the National headquarters in the Times building.

Standing Committees Will Meet

The national standing committees will meet for the purpose of organization during the coming week. Their work is of basic importance and indicates the thoroughness with which the methods of big business is working to shape the industry to power, vigor and efficiency. These committees are Standards, Nicholas Power, chairman. Fire Protection Regulation and Insurance, Jesse Lasky; Transportation, J. Stuart Blackton; Industrial Economics, Richard A. Rowland; Labor, P. A. Powers.

Campaign Conference Held

A campaign conference was held during the week and several letters were received from political candidates requesting the support of the national association and advancing their reasons therefor. The campaign committee, of which the chairman is Lee Ochs, president of the Exhibitors' League of America, will meet next week to hear his report.

Mr. Ochs has already reported that the exhibitors of New Hampshire have begun to effect a strong organization to combat hostile legislation at the coming session of the legislature. The Exhibitors' League will give aid and direction throughout New England.

The national association faces a year that will be filled with activities all over the country for the forty-four legislatures soon to convene will be watched for adverse legislation. Wherever it develops all of the resources of the organization will be called into play to defeat it. Legal talent and effective speakers familiar with the work, will be aided by the power of the exhibitor to influence public sentiment by the screen. The exhibitors of Philadelphia, where censorship is most onerous, have arranged for a conference with Mr. Ochs, on Sunday, October 1, at which time he will tell how the campaign was won in New York against State Senator Cristman, author of the Cristman Censorship bill, and offer advice on the local situation. Afterwards he will deliver an address during the evening at the Family Theater.

O. E. Goebel, president of Consolidated Film Corporation, presenting "The Crimson Stain Mystery," the sixteen-episode serial, has consummated a deal with Henry J. Brock, of New York, whereby Mr. Brock acquires the world rights exclusive of the United States and Canada to "The Crimson Stain Mystery."

NEW DISTRIBUTING FIRM

Sherrill of Frohman, Blache of United States, and G. H. Wiley of Van Dyke Companies, Will Produce Features for Art Dramas, Inc.

Art Dramas, Inc., is the name of the new distributing company formed to release the productions made by the Frohman Amusement Corporation, the United States Amusement Corporation and the Van Dyke Producing Company.

The officers of the company are William L. Sherrill, president; G. H. Wiley, vice-president and general manager; and Herbert Blache, secretary and treasurer.

The output of the company will be fifty-two features a year—one each week. According to its announcement the productions will not feature high-priced stars. Competent actors and actresses will be engaged to portray the various characterizations, but in no case will any individual be permitted to overshadow the production as a whole.

In addition to the companies now producing pictures for the Art Drama program it is understood that negotiations with two other manufacturers of quality features are under way.

Contracts for the distribution of the pictures have already been made with exchanges covering the greater part of the country. These include the Art Dramas Company of New York; the Art Dramas Company of New England; The Electric Theater Supply Company of Philadelphia; Silverman Brothers of Pittsburgh; J. A. Fitzgerald of Detroit; Sherman-Elliott, Inc., of Minneapolis; the Art Dramas Company of Chicago; and the Lasky Amusement Enterprises of San Francisco and Los Angeles. Contracts for the remaining territory, covered by Atlanta, Kansas City, Dallas, Seattle and Denver, are under consideration.

The officers of the distributing company are the executives of the organizations that are to manufacture the pictures, and the quality of the pictures to be produced is best attested by the personnel of these producing companies.

Probably the best known of the three companies is the Frohman Amusement Corporation, of which William L. Sherrill is president. This company has been in business about two years and the quality of its product is well known throughout the trade. The two last productions of the Frohman company, "Jaffery" and "The Conquest of Canaan," have aroused a great deal of favorable comment. The pictures which this company will contribute to the Art Dramas program will be under a different brand, but they will be made under the direct supervision of William L. Sherrill.

Herbert Blache, the secretary and treasurer of the Art Dramas Company, has for a long time been identified with the making of quality features. He was associated with the Popular Plays and Players Company, and in conjunction with Madame Blache, probably the best known of the women directors, has produced a number of pictures on the Metro program. The Blaches are the owners of the Solax and the Greater Blache studios, and have a most efficient organization for the manufacture of features.

G. H. Wiley, the vice-president and general manager, is well known to all those familiar with the motion picture industry. He is the head of the Van Dyke Producing Company, which has taken over the Kalem studios on West Nineteenth street, New York City. Mr. Wiley has manufactured pictures for the last two years, and has a number of excellent five-reel features and one-reel comedies to his credit. The studio is completely equipped in every way, and is capable of turning out features of a high order of merit.

The producing companies making up the Art Dramas program are amply financed to carry out their policy and plans. The announcement of the first four releases will be made in the very near future.

Working Out New "Pick-up" System

MOTOGRAPHY, in its past few issues, has gone to some length in discussing a proposed new delivery and pick-up service which the Charles Levy Film Service Company is planning to put into operation in Chicago Further action has been taken regarding this all-important matter by both the service company and the exchanges, both working through the F.I.L.M. Club.

Mr. Foley, connected with the Levy people and the father of the idea, during the course of a conversation with one of MOTOGRAPHY's representatives, briefly outlined how this service would be conducted if inaugurated.

"Under the present plan of handling film being returned to the exchanges, there are anywhere from ten up to one hundred different people running in and out of the exchanges with film at all hours of the day and night. These people are not all known to the shipping and receiving clerks at the exchanges and in the event that one out of five reels of a feature should be missing it is next to impossible to locate the man who returned the film. That wouldn't be so with films which are handled through our organization. Regular automobile routes will be established and the entire load of film to be returned to the exchanges will be delivered to the shipping room of the Levy Service Company. Here all the films going to Paramount, for example, will be separated from the rest. Then when all the pick-ups are in, everything going back to Paramount will be delivered to them at one time, the same being done with property of all the other exchanges."

The proposed plan as far as we have been made acquainted with it looks to us like an ideal arrangement which will receive the endorsement of both the exchanges and the exhibitors will go a long way toward correcting one of the evils connected with the exhibiting of motion pictures.

It is really very gratifying to watch the effort that is being made by everybody interested in the picture industry to put the business on a sound and tried business basis. More power to them.

Lou-Tellegen Returns to Stage

Lou-Tellegen, popular Lasky star, upon completion of "The Black Wolf," which is now in the course of production at the Lasky studios in Hollywood, will terminate his spring and summer engagement with the Lasky company and return to the stage.

Reversing the usual order, Lou-Tellegen will this winter appear in a dramatization of one of the screen plays in which he has been presented by the Lasky company. "It is perfectly amazing to me," said Lou-Tellegen the other day to a correspondent in Hollywood, "to realize the tremendous numbers who become interested in the players' work on the screen."

Universal Director Rupert Julian [illegible] five-reel production, "We Are French."

"What the Picture Did for Me"

ACTUAL CRITICISM OF FILMS BY EXHIBITORS, FROM A BUSINESS STANDPOINT

(Editorial Note:—"The trade paper that can give the most accurate information about current features is the paper every exhibitor wants," said a prominent manager recently. In addition to its regular reviews, MOTOGRAPHY will each week hereafter print the actual unvarnished opinions of exhibitors on films they have run in their houses, with the idea of aiding other exhibitors in making up their programs.)

"FAIR and nothing to rave about," is the way Manager Moore, at the Orpheum Theater, Chicago, expresses himself about "THE DAWN OF LOVE," featuring Mabel Taliaferro. "It is the star and not the picture that attracts."

"'THE FLAW IN THE EVIDENCE,' Thanhouser, proved a very good attraction."—George Madison, Kozy Theater.

"'THE DARING OF DIANA' is nothing strong, but can be classed as a fair picture; business was fair."—Manager Moore, Orpheum Theater.

"'THE FRENCH MILLINER,' Triangle Komedy, featuring Fay Tincher, can be classed as ordinary."—Manager George Moore, Orpheum Theater.

"A fairly good picture of an ordinary type."—Manager Moore, Orpheum Theater, Chicago, speaking about "THE DARK SILENCE," with Clara Kimball Young.

Manager C. J. Miller, of the Spencer Square Theater, Rock Island, Illinois, a 1,000-seat house, rebooked "MARVELOUS MACISTE," to be run at his house on October 5.

"'THE JUNGLE CHILD,' a Triangle feature in which Dorothy Dalton and Howard Hickman are starred, is an excellent picture with a very poorly selected name."—Joseph Trinz, Biograph Theater, Chicago.

"'THE DAWN MAKER,' featuring W. S. Hart, disappointed me very much. Evidently people do not like to see a big star such as Hart playing the part of an Indian."—Manager George Moore, Orpheum Theater.

They are still asking twenty-five cents at the La Salle Opera House for admission to "WHERE ARE MY CHILDREN?" the big "U" feature. This picture is starting on its tenth week at this house and they are still getting the twenty-five pesos.

Pictures are run at least one week at the Bijou Dream on State street, Chicago. "THE EVIL WOMEN DO," Bluebird, showed there recently. "We had a very good week with this picture and received much favorable comment from our patrons," said Sigmund Faller, manager.

Mrs. Quinn, manager at the Majestic Theater, Rock Island, Illinois, showed Theda Bara in "HER DOUBLE LIFE," one day last week. It went over so big that she determined to run it again. Fearing some misunderstanding might occur in letter writing, she made a special trip to Chicago to rebook the feature.

"Triangle's 'THE DAWN MAKER,' with William S. Hart, is a picture with an excellent theme but spoiled due to the fact that Hart plays the part of an Indian. My patrons do not favor this and I expect a heavy loss of patronage on days on which I show Hart again unless they discontinue asking him to play such parts. Pictures in which he portrays the role of a minister or reformer take very well in my theater."—Joseph Trinz, Biograph Theater, Chicago.

"As a picture, 'THE FIRES OF CONSCIENCE,' featuring William Farnum, is only fair, as a box office attraction, A. number one."

"Theda Bara, in 'HER DOUBLE LIFE,' is a really great picture; it gave us the biggest week day this house has ever had."

"Louise Glaum, in 'THE WOLF WOMAN,' appeals to an inquisitive class of people, it being inclined to be rather spicy in spots, not immoral, but slightly suggestive. I can vouch for it being a good box office attraction."

"On Monday, October 1, I had Charley Chaplin in 'THE PAWN SHOP' and at 11 A. M. had taken in $35 more than had been taken in at the same time on the day we showed his previous picture. The picture proved itself an unusual box office tonic and we cleaned up on it."

"'MISTER 44' is a picture which contains a story a little different from that found in the ordinary run of stuff. This coupled with the fact that Harold Lockwood and May Allison do the co-starring, accounts for a full house during the entire day it was showing at my theater."

"Every seat in the house was filled the major portion of the day and evening on which we had Norma Talmadge in 'THE SOCIAL SECRETARY.'"

The following pictures have been shown at the Boston Theater, Chicago, during the past few days and the comments of Manager H. C. Miller follow:

Saturday, September 30—"'THE DARK SILENCE,' World, in which Clara Kimball Young is featured, is built around a story which might be called good; the Photography is, as a whole, good. Business great."

Sunday, October 1—Valeska Suratt, in "The Straight Way," Fox. "The story is fair; the photography good; the star, freakish; poor dramatics. Business was good."

Monday, October 2—Charlie Chaplin, in "The Pawn Shop." "The story is rather deep; questionable whether an audience gets it seeing it only once; the photography is good; star, good; business, great. 'The Yellow Menace,' Number 5, as a serial, good."

Tuesday, October 3—Dorothy Dalton and Howard Hickman, both formerly members of the Bush Temple stock company, co-starring in "The Jungle Child," Triangle. "Story, peculiar; photography, fair; business, good. Charles Murry, Keystoning in 'The Maid Man,' good."

Wednesday, October 4—Douglas Fairbanks, in "Manhattan Madness." "Story fine and business great."

Press News and the Exhibitor

By F. W. Burke,
Manager Strand Theater, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Just a line or two relative to "press dope," cuts and mats which newspapers receive gratis from the producer and the exhibitor is obliged to pay dearly for.

First, I will ask this question: Mr. Publicity Department, tell me why you send a world of stuff to newspaper editors and stick the humble exhibitor for every mat and cut you see fit to send him?

From my personal experience in the sanctum of an editorial room and having held down the position of "motion picture editor," I will frankly say that nine per cent of the press dope, mats, and so forth, mailed to editors lands in the realm of the waste paper basket. Seldom does a motion picture editor on a regular newspaper use the canned stuff, but resorts to all kinds of tactics to dope out a page with a local touch to it, and one full of live stuff. Now, the point I am trying to get at is, why can't the exhibitor receive the same allotment of stuff? I will venture to say that if the publicity men would put their stuff in the hands of the exhibitor instead of the newspapers that occasionally a mat of some prominent star or a feature article would get by—in fact, I'll prove it if the film corporations that I deal with will treat me that way.

An exhibitor by "newspaper law" is entitled to a certain amount of space daily, for a reader or anything that he wishes to run with his paid ad. Now, isn't it logical that Mr. Exhibitor is in a position to put the stuff over that under the present method is baled with the rest of the paper down in the basement of the newspaper office?

I think this is a proposition for the publicity men to think over and one upon which countless exhibitors and newspaper men will agree with me.

Chicago Operators Raise Wages

A Los Angeles theater owner a few weeks ago, speaking about the salaries he paid his theater help, remarked that he was paying his operator $8.00 per week and thought it robbery. If $8.00 per week is robbery, what would you call paying thirty or thirty-five dollars per week—and still going up?

The Chicago operators have increased their scale of wages so that each man is given a raise of two dollars per week. With two operators many houses now find $4.00 added to the weekly payroll. So far the exhibitors have raised no formal complaint.

Film Men Interview Wilson

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION'S SPECIAL COMMITTEE SEES PRESIDENT

THE National Association of the Motion Picture Industry, following out its policy outlined at the Chicago Convention that every prospective candidate for the chair of President of the United States, as well as the smaller offices, should be asked to state definitely his stand on the censorship question, appointed a special committee to interview President Wilson.

At a meeting of the executive committee the following were chosen as members of that committee to wait upon the president at Shadow Lawn on October 3, and obtain his views on the subject of censorship.

Walter W. Irwin of the Greater Vitagraph as spokesman; Adolph Zukor and Jesse Lasky of the Famous Players-Lasky-Morosco Films; William L. Sherrill, Frohman Amusement Company; Marcus Loew, John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual; Richard A. Rowland, president, and Arthur James of the Metro; Hiram Abrams, Paramount; P. A. Powers, Universal; David W. Griffith, Thomas H. Ince and Mack Sennett.

Lee Ochs, Louis F. Blumenthal and L. L. Levine of the Exhibitors' League of America; Daniel Frohman, George Kleine, president of the General Film Company; E. A. McManus, International Film Service; F. C. Gunning, B. A. Rolfe and Joseph W. Engle of the Metro; Samuel H. Trigger, J. H. Hallberg, Fred Hawley, W. Stephen Bush of the Moving Picture World; William A. Johnston of the Motion Picture News; Henry Branson Warner, Lexington (N. C.) Despatch, and editor of the Southern Good Roads Magazine; Herbert Blache, W. Wright, Kalem; H. E. Aitken, Triangle; John Tuerk, World.

A special invitation was extended to Thomas A. Edison.

A delegation left the Pennsylvania station on the 12:34 train, which enabled the motion picture men to arrive at Shadow Lawn a short time before the hour set for the reception at 2:15 p. m.

The members of the executive committee of the National Association took occasion at their meeting to pass a resolution thanking The Morning Telegraph for the support this paper has lent the motion picture industry.

Present at the meeting were Walter W. Irwin of the Greater Vitagraph, W. L. Sherrill of the Frohman Amusement Company, J. E. Brulatour of the Eastman Films, Samuel Trigger of the Tremont Theater, Arthur James of Metro, P. A. Powers of the Universal Manufacturing Company, L. L. Levine of the Regent Theater, Brooklyn; William M. Seabury, general counsel, and Frederick H. Elliott, executive secretary. Mr. Irwin presided. The committee gave careful consideration to the matter before the above decision was made.

New Distributing Plan for Triangle

FILMS RELEASED THROUGH INDEPENDENT EXCHANGES

THE Triangle Film Corporation has put into effect a semi-co-operative plan of distribution which permits the return to active participation in film circulation of the independent exchange man.

Below will be found a detailed statement by President H. E. Aitken of the Triangle Film Corporation which sets forth the reasons for this departure from what is termed monopolistic tendencies in the film industry. In its briefest essentials the Triangle plan permits the purchase by independent exchange men of an interest in the present Triangle branch offices, and as a result a wider field of distribution.

That the three producing companies now supplying Triangle with its film product are heartily in accord with the new plan will be seen in a measure from the statements appended to President Aitken's announcement. The directors of these producing companies are returning to Los Angeles, by their own report, with renewed enthusiasm for what Mack Sennett has termed "a long stride forward."

The new plan will have what is practically an immediate effect, and one of the first sections to undergo the readjustment on the new basis is the New York exchange, which will admit to partnership Alfred Weiss, former Eastern district superintendent of the Triangle Film Corporation, and some associates. The New England territory, with headquarters in Boston, is next affected, and by degrees the new co-operative plan will extend to all branches of the company's business. Mr. Aitken said:

President Aitken's Statement

The general system of distribution of film is a subject to which I have been giving close attention for a good many years, first as the owner of several film exchanges, later as a stockholder in producing companies, and finally as President of two large distributing organizations.

I have found that in almost every instance in which an independent exchange operated by its owner has been bought out by a producing or distributing company, the gross business of the exchange has fallen off, the service to exhibitors has been less satisfactory and the expense has increased.

It is not unnatural to believe that when the independent exchange is put back into business, the service to exhibitors will improve, the gross business will increase and the expense of doing business will fall off. A comparison with other businesses verifies the belief that a man in business for himself will invariably give better service to his customer than the same man as a representative of a distant corporation.

Not only the producer and the exchange man, but each individual benefits greatly from extra promotion effort on each film. Moreover, the more prints of a film that are bought by exchanges, the better it is possible to make the pictures.

The idea on which we are now working tends in two directions—first, toward the independent ownership of exchanges through which Triangle Films will be supplied to theaters, and second, toward a constant increase in the number of smaller exchanges within each general exchange district.

It is not unnatural that the opportunity to conduct a business of their own should be attracting the most vigorous and able film men the country over. A good many who have owned exchanges in the past, but who, because they refused to work for large corporations as exchange managers, have actually left the business, are indicating to us their desire to return to it again as independent exchange men.

The exhibitor in any district will not (when this system is thoroughly installed) be dealing with the agent of a distant concern, but with the owner of a nearby independent business. The whole change, while it seems a radical one, is as a matter of fact a natural development caused by the demand on the part of the exhibitor for better service, and on the part of the public for better films. Curiously enough, it is at the same time a reversion from the more or less artificial system of the last few years to the strength that gave the film industry its original impetus—a strength which was taken away from it when the first large combination of producing companies put the independent exchange out of business for their own profit.

One point which has been very interesting and which has been, I confess, somewhat of a surprise, is the enthusiasm with which the idea has been accepted, not only by well known exchange men throughout the country but by prominent producers, distributors and exhibitors with whom I have talked.

"Of Greatest Benefit," Declares Kessel

Adam Kessel, Jr., president of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, controlling both the Keystone and Kay Bee studios, stated that he was in the most hearty accord with every detail of the new arrangement. Mr. Kessel said:

I feel I know a little something about the film exchanges of the country, as I put in six years or so as an exchange man before entering the manufacturing field, and I can emphatically say that I believe the new co-operative plan is one that is going to be of the greatest possible benefit to the industry as a whole. While enormous sums have been necessarily used in the installation of the numerous branch offices of the great manufacturing and distributing companies, this expenditure has not been the greatest disturbing element of the existing film conditions throughout the country. To my mind it has been the lack of personal interest and personal touch in the relations of the branch managers and the exhibitors.

To the great bulk of exhibitors throughout the country the main office of the company is far off, and to a great extent unsympathetic with their problems and necessities. If readjustment of relationships is necessary, the branch manager has largely had no discretion to make that readjustment, but has been forced to communicate with the main office, receive instructions from there, and then follow those instructions to the letter. I know that this is a wrong method. I know that the men on the ground, the men familiar with the local conditions are the ones who should make such readjustments, up or down, as may be necessary, and that the manufacturing company should back these men and their judgment to the limit.

There is no doubt whatever in my mind that the new Triangle plan is one of the greatest possible benefits that has come to the film industry as a whole in recent years. I am glad to recognize that it is a return to right and just principles, and that we are now getting upon a sane and stable footing in our distribution work. One great thing that will make itself felt is the greater harmony of working that must ensue, and this will naturally improve all the conditions.

The manufacturers now contributing to the Triangle service will obviously be greatly benefited by the new arrangement, for they will now be permitted to give all their time and attention to the manufacturing of film, leaving the producers—and this includes myself—to devote all their time to the production of better pictures. While the public may not realize this, it is going to be of the greatest possible service in raising the quality of Triangle product from this time on. Speaking for Kessel & Baumann I can say that the new Triangle plan is most heartily endorsed by us.

"Plan Has My Approval," Says Ince

Thomas H. Ince, just prior to his departure for Los Angeles, gave his entire commendation to the new plan of the Triangle Film Corporation. As Mr. Ince is one of the prime cogs in the Triangle machine, his approval has definite and important significance. Mr. Ince said:

When I say that the new Triangle plan of distribution has my entire approval, I think I have said all that can be asked. My reasons are purely personal ones, in one way, and quite general ones from another view. I think that this return to a measure of independence in the exchanges and distribution is a marked step forward, and one that I have been hoping for during some years. The tendency in the motion picture industry has apparently been quite away from this present Triangle plan, and I think I am not alone when I say that this has seemed quite opposite to the best interests, not only of the producers of film, but of the exhibitors and of the public.

We have reached a point of development in the picture industry that requires something more than the effort to monopolize all the details of our business. My own feeling is that a measure of profit sharing is the proper angle of approach to better business. I think we have just that in the new plan. I know that I am much encouraged over the outlook, and I hope this encouragement will manifest itself in better pictures for the new Triangle arrangement. There are things I have long wanted to do, and I think I have now the necessary enthusiasm to attempt them. We are now in a position to produce better pictures, and I feel quite confident that under the new circumstances we shall all work together with a greater degree of enthusiasm and with the knowledge that the public will have even a greater opportunity to see the work of our hands as exemplified in the product of our studios.

I have never been wholly at ease under the limited, and I may say, concentrated method of distribution. Now I do feel comfortable, and I think I return to Los Angeles with a feeling that Triangle quality will be higher than ever before, and speaking for the Culver City plant, I know that I am going to do my best to make it so.

Mack Sennett Gives Indorsement

Concerning the new Triangle plan as outlined by President Aitken, Mack Sennett, producer of the famous Keystone comedies, and who necessarily is a vital factor in the new arrangement, said:

I am heartily in accord with the new Triangle plan. While Keystone is comparatively a new development in the motion picture field, having existed only since 1912, I am not without experience in and knowledge of the independent exchange. I feel that the Triangle Film Corporation has made a long stride forward in making this move, and I believe it to be solidly in accord with advanced commercial practice, for the monopolistic tendencies that have been growing up in the film business are not at all in line, so far as my view goes, with the advance in business methods of recent years.

One of the features of the new plan that particularly appeals to me is the opportunity it gives me, as a producer, to get closer, not only to the exchange man, but to the exhibitor, and I am pleased to know that I am to consider now that the exchange is in reality my partner, that my success depends upon the success of the exchange men, and that both of us have a common interest, a common working point, that must inevitably produce better results for all concerned.

When I say this I do not confine myself to results of a financial nature, but to the production of better film. Thus the exhibitor and the public alike will benefit by the new arrangement. Co-operation in the film business has for years appealed to me as the great need. We have not had that to anything like the extent we should, and in this new plan, as put into operation by Mr. Aitken, I feel we have come nearer to the ideal relationship than anything that has been set forth before.

I am returning to Los Angeles with renewed hope for the future, and with a determination to lend my best efforts to improving the output of the Keystone studio, which, as heretofore, will be replaced only by the Triangle Film Corporation. The public will, I hope, readily detect that nothing has detracted from my personal intention to always place quality before quantity. I am in the new plan, in full accord with it in every way

Fulton Denies Merger Rumor

For the past month there has been a persistent rumor in Chicago which has it that "Morgan" interests have bought up all the larger supply houses in the country. The rumor does not state definitely who the "Morgan" is who is spending all this money.

F. E. Fulton, president of the "Fulco" company of Chicago, when questioned about it, said that he had heard about it, but assured us that he has seen no offer from "Morgan" to buy him out. Some time ago one of the film critics on a Chicago daily newspaper called attention to the chaotic condition of the film business and remarked that it was to be hoped that a "Morgan" would some day come along and put the film industry on a business basis. Evidently some ambitious publicity "hound" read this story and started this story.

Director Charles Swickard is nearing the finish of his production at Universal City of "The Lie," which features Hobart Henley supported by Gertrude Selby. C. G. Briden plays the role of a Chinese, while Henley enacts four different characterizations.

FATTY TELLS A STORY

WHEN Fatty Arbuckle was in Chicago on his way to the celluloid coast he told us the following dog-goned story on himself.

Mrs. Arbuckle one day passed a theater where her illustrous and capacious better half was shown on the bill. A little woe-begone neighbor boy stood at one end of a string and a little woe-begone pup sat at the other end. The boy was gazing round-eyed at the one-sheets and looked as though he wanted to go to the show.

"Do you want to see the show, little boy?" inquired Mrs. Arbuckle.

"I want to see Fatty," replied the urchin.

"Have you got any money?"

"Nope!"

"Would you sell your dog?"

"Sure!"—without an instant's hesitation.

And so the deal was made. The boy went in to see Fatty with fifteen cents to spare, and Mrs. Arbuckle went home with the dog.

The next afternoon Mrs. Arbuckle saw the boy again, "Well, how did you like Fatty yesterday?"

The reply was blunt and decisive.

"I want my dog back."

GUEST LIST

Dave Griffith, Tom Ince, Mack Sennett, directors of motion pictures, E. R. Seelye, a Pathe clerk, May Murray, Bess Bear'scale, Gracie Darmond, Ede Storey, Em Stevens, and Fatty Arbuckle, posers for the pictures, all of them and some more came to Chicago to spend seven or eight days last week. And yet,—and yet, there are some as say that our fair and well-ventilated village is not the logical center of the industry.

A FLOCK OF WORSHIP

As nearly everybody in the film business knows, September 28 is Rosh-Hashanah, the Jewish New Year. Theoretically, all that sacred day is spent in silent and continual Thanksgiving prayer. According to one of their number, ninety per centum of the film men of Chicago devoutly remained away from their offices that day and made pilgrimages to their neighborhood picture houses. These temples of silent melodrama then became the scene of their devotions.

POWERFUL BRITISH DRAMA

"From Hen to Hospital" is the title of a recent English screen drama described as a "play with a purpose." This powerful factory-to-consumer story deals with eggs. Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, is the patroness of the National Egg Collection Fund and is encouraging the egg drama because this great feature is proving to be of great aid in impressing upon the mind the importance of providing enough eggs for the hospitals of the wounded. This powerful drama deals only with fresh eggs otherwise, of course, it might be too powerful.

A Chain of Children's Programs

BY MAX ASCHER

(Note—Ascher Brothers, Max, Nathan and Harry, operate a chain of fourteen motion picture theaters.)

WHY did we instruct the managers of our chain of fourteen motion picture theaters to run special performances for the children? Because we had to. Not that this compulsion was at all a hardship, for I am very fond of children and am only too glad to add to their pleasure in this way. But from the standpoint of good business policy we were forced to run in our houses a program which was primarily for the youngsters.

It was not competition that forced us to carry out this plan of catering to the kiddies, for our houses were among the first—in fact, were the first neighborhood theaters in the City of Chicago to take up this campaign for the children. We were forced into this because we saw the demand for it and our policy is to cater in every way to the desires of the motion picture public and give them the very best service possible in supplying these demands. We saw that there was a field for this work. We saw that the public wanted it. We saw that the children needed it—and so we bowed to their wishes. The will of the public is supreme with us. This was one time when someone else got ahead of us in realizing the demand, however, for I will admit the idea of these performances did not originate with us. They were brought to our attention by the Parent-Teacher Associations which are waging a campaign for these special matinees all over the country. And we are glad they did bring the matter to our attention. We were very glad to co-operate with them and try out the idea at least. And this trial proved that they were right. The largest proportion of the patronage of the motion picture theater is made up of women and children with the honors pretty evenly divided but a little balance on the side of the women. Managers have always striven to cater to the women, so why should they not also cater to the other predominating element—the children?

We do not interfere with the managers of our theaters. They are at perfect liberty to work out their own salvation and to originate their own ideas and carry out their own plans. We did suggest that they try the special program for children and they were very glad to give it a trial, as they are any idea offered for the betterment of their house. They not only experimented with this idea but made a success of it. And every man worked it out differently. Some gave over the whole afternoon to the children's matinee, one tried having it on Saturday morning, others gave an hour before the regular program for the little folks and then proceeded with the regular show; still others tried just choosing some feature for Saturday which was really produced for general use but contained nothing objectionable from the younger people's standpoint and then ran in an extra comedy, educational subject, or cartoon comedy to please the children.

Through the various methods used we gave the subject a pretty thorough all-around trial and found that what the club women had told us was true—there was a great demand for these selected programs and the mothers and children would uphold us in our endeavors by patronizing them. Now these kiddies' performances are part of the regular routine of the houses. All of our managers are not running them on the same plan on which they started, however. They have experimented and compared notes to find the most effective way of running these and the almost universal practice is to have the matinee for the children immediately precede the regular Saturday afternoon performance. One manager discovered that the morning entertainments bothered the mothers on making them stop their Saturday morning housework long enough to get the little folks ready to go to the theater. Another found that by giving over the whole Saturday afternoon to the children he spoiled his matinee business, which had always been exceedingly good. Still another found that just running in an extra picture for the children was not enough, and so the result of the various experiments led to the conclusion that as a general rule the children's hour immediately preceding the regular afternoon performance was the most psychological time for the theater manager to get the best results from the show for the younger members of the family. This gave the mothers time to get through their work and the youngsters dressed; it did not interfere with the afternoon performance in any way; and at the same time it was all for the children and so gave them just what they wanted.

It is a peculiar fact that the only one of the houses where the children's matinees were not a success was that conducted by my brother, Harry Ascher, one of the firm of Ascher Brothers. He tried the matinees the same as the other managers and kept it going long enough to give it a fair trial, but evidently the people of his neighborhoor did not want the special performance for the children. It was not because there were not enough children to draw from for there is no race suicide in that community, but they did not support the children's hour. In fact, the showing of the pictures suitable for the little folks killed his whole Saturday business. This was due no doubt to the class of people to whom he caters. He discontinued these, therefore, and compromised by giving the children some special picture each day in the week. In planning his program he aims to have one picture which will especially appeal to the children. It may be a one-reel comedy that will be sure to give them a good laugh, an educational, a travelogue, a cartoon comedy, or some film which the little folks will immediately recognize as theirs. This scheme he has found to work very well. The mothers appear to be perfectly satisfied with this arrangement and the children feel that the manager knows they are there and is trying to please them as well as their parents.

The whole afternoon devoted to the children is in too many cases a failure from the monetary standpoint and for this reason many exhibitors who have felt that there was a field for something of this kind and tried this method have given it up as a bad job. The scheme of having a children's hour, however, is not to be decried as a box office attraction when you can average from four to five hundred children a week, as a number of our exhibitors do.

As to the question which so many have asked as to the holding of these special performances bringing the neighborhood manager any great benefit in the form of gaining the good will of the people of the community I cannot say. I am sure it does not hurt his standing any, and with few exceptions you will find that the way to a mother's heart is through doing something to please her children. And undoubtedly the mothers must hold a very friendly feeling toward the theater which is catering to their children. There is in almost every neighborhood a Parent-Teacher Association or a Women's Club, and they are always anxious to work with the manager along this line. They help the manager by advertising his theater and he helps them in carrying on the community work which they have under consideration, so there is a mutual benefit to be gained. And every woman member of those clubs will naturally have a feeling of good will toward the manager who is helping them to accomplish the work they have set before themselves.

There are other indirect ways in which these performances benefit the exhibitor. For example, the patrons are not half as liable to find fault with the programs which the manager is running from the standpoint that some of the pictures have scenes which although not objectionable when viewed through adult eyes are undesirable for the children to see, in a house where a special performance is run for the children, for then they feel that it is their fault as much as the manager's if the children see those pictures. He is running a special performance with a view not only of giving the small people a good time but also giving them pictures which will be perfectly proper for them to see, and they can send the children to those performances instead of bringing them at night. So that half the strength of their argument is lost and they are really forced to share this responsibility with the managers.

I am most heartily in favor of special performances for the children. I believe in them. I also believe that it will not be very long before the theater which does not devote at least an hour a week to the children, their amusement and education, will be the exception instead of the rule. Who doesn't love the children and who would not give them pleasure whenever possible?

But aside from all feelings of sentiment toward the kiddies, aside from the desire to please the ladies by co-operating with them, the Ascher houses devote one performance a week to the children because they believe that every up-to-date motion picture house, every theater that is catering to the family, is an all-around, successful, well managed house, and is giving the public just the service which it desires, must include in their category a performance especially for the children.

"Charity?" Shown in New York

"Charity?", the first feature of the Frank Powell Productions, Inc., in which appear Creighton Hale, Linda A. Griffith and Sheldon Lewis, was given a private showing at Loew's New York Theater Roof on September 26 before an audience unusual in size and character. Present were not only practically every person of prominence in the picture world, but as well most of those interested in the recent charities investigation. Among the audience that packed the New York Roof were Mgr. J. J. Dunn, Archbishopric of New York, Father William B. Farrell, Dr. James J. Higgins, Rev. W. A. Courtney, Hon. John A. Kingsbury, commissioner of public charities of the City of New York, and Deputy Commissioners Henry C. Wright, Wm. J. Doherty, George G. Thomson, and Stanley H. Howe, secretary of the department of public charities, Dr. Ludwig B. Bernstein, of the Hebrew Sheltering Guardian society, Dr. R. R. Reeder of the orphan asylum of the City of New York, and John A. Sleicher, editor of Leslie's Weekly. Also present were Lillian Russell and Mme. Cross Newhaus, president of the Society of Beaux Arts.

Splendid music accompanied the presentation of the picture.

It is understood that "Charity?", written by Linda A. Griffith, has aroused intense interest among those concerned with the conditions considered in the picture "Charity?", which was directed by Frank Powell, will be released on a state rights basis.

Vitagraph Continues Comedies

Frank Currier has made "Billy's Melodrama," one of the finest comedies Vitagraph has yet contributed to the General Film program, which appears October 9. On the thirteenth of October, "The Mayor's Fall from Grace" will be released by the General Film exchanges. The mayor forgets his promise to his wife to attend a five o'clock reception when a delegation of politicians wait on him with the news that he is to be nominated for governor. A mild celebration follows and it is well after five o'clock when he recalls his reception engagement. We leave the rest to your screen.

The Ohio Board of Motion Picture Censors not content with barring "The Birth of a Nation" because some of the colored brethren near Xenia protested, cut the shears through a picture of Bandit Villa, and the latest action is to cut out pictures of bathing girls in the Selig news weekly. These pictures present a number of water nymphs, attired in perfectly proper bathing suits, passed by the Chicago Board of Censors. Verily, the policies of the Ohio censors passeth understanding.

AN OPEN FORUM

This is a department of, by and for exhibitors. We want YOU represented here. Other managers and proprietors of picture theaters want to hear YOUR experiences, your opinions and your advice. Write to this department telling us your story, how you started, how you grew and all about your theater and how you manage it. Mention your advertising methods and your lobby displays. If possible send in photographs of yourself and your house. Address, The Forum, Motography, Chicago.

Good Advertising Contest

J. D. MEYERS, of the firm of Meyers and Leiter, exhibitors in La Grande, Oregon, inaugurated a very clever medium by which they greatly increased their business in connection with the presentment of "The Clown," a Paramount picture produced by Lasky.

A week prior to the showing of this picture, Mr. Meyers announced to his patrons that he would award a month's pass to the Arcade Theater, for the best hand drawn pictures of clowns and a two weeks' pass to the second best, the drawings to be made by children under 16 years of age.

The mail was filled with letters in response to the announcement and more than 400 children drew their conception of clowns. These drawings were exhibited in artistically arranged sets in the lobby of the theater during the showing of the feature and created a great amount of favorable comment and interest among the older people of the community, as well as the youngsters.

Three Houses of the Middle West

Here are three theaters as representative of the cities in which they are located as is the Strand of New York or the Colonial of Chicago. They are the Alhambra of Milwaukee, New Garrick of Minneapolis, and the New Majestic of St. Paul. To say that these houses have installed innovations is the same as recording something new in the style book of motion picture theaters.

Everyone in the motion picture industry in the central west has heard of the Alhambra Theater of Milwaukee. Manager Fischer has a keen sense of showmanship and a wide knowledge of amusements and how to serve them. There perhaps is no other manager more keen for courtesy in his employes than is Mr. Fischer. With his ability he has made the Alhambra of Milwaukee the pride of the motion picture industry in his section of the country. He uses the Paramount program.

Under the guidance of Manager Calvert, the New Garrick Theater of Minneapolis has been offering Paramount pictures to Minneapolis' most critical photoplay fans. The house is noted not only for its superior attractions, but for the perfect manner in which the house is conducted. Mr. Calvert employs many original ways of procuring patronage, including splendidly enticing lobby displays, such as the one shown in the picture. Note the fine taste in the arrangement of the display.

At the New Majestic in St. Paul, Mr. Goldman not only manages the theater, but also manages to draw the biggest audiences of that critical city. He also runs the Paramount program. The New Majestic is in the midst of many photoplay houses, but enjoys a peculiar distinction because of the many careful plans Mr. Goldman makes and executes to attract favorable public attention to his house.

Children Flock to "Pink Slip" Show

By Harry E. Ascher

Manager, Columbus Theater, Chicago, Illinois.

More than 110 children attended one performance of "The Little Girl Next Door" when I was running it in my house, although it was advertised and shown under the "No Children Admitted" sign—and the city officials raised no objection at all. The policeman on the block walked up and down and saw all the children going in with their mothers but he said not a word to the mothers or to me.

No, I did not have any special dispensation. I was living up to the letter of the law to the best of my ability and trying to conform to the city ordinance because this was a film whose showing was watched very closely by the city authorities, but in this case I was helpless.

If you had walked by the theater on that afternoon you would have understood the situation in a minute—and like the policeman would have smiled and walked on.

A Hundred Baby Carriages

Lined up and down the sidewalk in front of the theater, extending along in front of the stores on either side, and grouped in front of the poster carrying a "No Children Admitted" sign, were 110 baby carriages. No, the babies were not in them—they had gone inside to the show with their mothers—and the Board of Censors never cared a bit.

There are always a goodly number of baby carriages parked in front of my theater and a number of young children of less than school age inside because the women of the neighborhood have no one with whom to leave the little ones and if they come they must bring the children along. So when the carts began to line up I did not think much about it. Then someone came in and remarked that I must be having a baby show this afternoon. I went outside and was confronted by seventy-eight baby carriages of every make and description. After that I kept count and the highest number reached during the afternoon was 110.

The drawing power of the film was, of course, exceptionally great on this afternoon, but there is little doubt as to who makes up the largest proportion of the patrons of the motion picture theaters, and this is a good point to be kept in mind by the managers in choosing their programs.

City Votes on Theater Bill

A unique election was held in Somerville, Massachusetts, recently, the question at issue being what motion picture service was to be maintained in the leading theater, the Cross Street Theater, for the coming season.

The house changed hands, and for service the new management retained what the former manager had installed but with little satisfaction. He decided upon an election by the people, and for them to decide what program he should run. In accordance with his idea he and his representatives visited 1,400 homes, rang the bell, told who they were, what their object was and had the dwellers in those homes vote on the following services: Paramount, Triangle, Metro and Fox.

As a result 1,120 families out of the 1,400 requested Paramount pictures. A goodly amount of publicity was given the unique idea by the newspapers of that community, and the result of the voting was looked forward to with the keenest interest.

Censor Stops Show and Clips Film

Evidently the censor board of Evanston, Illinois, has obtained the impression that the people in that model community are victims of pathologic suggestability to vice and crime, or that the standards of morals in that community are deplorably low. This town boasts a censor board consisting of two women.

Pauline Frederick, in "The Woman in the Case," a Famous Players drama, was recently played in the Hoyborn Theater, in that suburb. The story of the picture has to do with a baffling murder mystery. In the fourth reel of the picture, one woman plys another with wine in an effort to wrest a confession from her.

Here is what the Evanston censor board did. What would you have done if they had done the same thing at your theater?

After reviewing the picture in the morning they ordered about three hundred feet cut; this was done and the afternoon performance started. That afternoon one of the censors visited the theater while it was crowded with an enthusiastic audience.

After four reels had been run and the scenes in which the one woman plys the other with wine were flashed on the screen, the censor ordered the picture stopped and forced the manager to cut out the entire drinking scene. This consumed more than fifteen minutes, during which time a highly indignant audience sat looking at a white screen. The censor's insane action in this matter ruined a powerful climax.

Of course, one only needs to pick up almost any daily newspaper and find more crime and more scandal given publicity than will be found in any photoplay.

A Refined Argument

A mighty good example of exhibitorial argument is found on a page of the splendid house organ and program issued by the Victoria Theater of Buffalo. Observe the suggestion of refinement the article gives and the fine English in which it is expressed.

Broadening the Gap.

A photoplay is a combination of story, acting and photography.

A perfect photoplay is a delicate synchronization—blending together—of these ingredients.

Sometimes in the telling of a good story photography is slighted; sometimes the acting fails to reach the heights of the direction.

Far and wide the Victoria has gained an enviable reputation for the sureness with which it builds together the delicate structure called a photoplay.

Victoria photoplays have been termed the highest standard of photographic drama." The success of a visit on a photoplay is as consistently sound as the perfection of a timepiece marked "Swiss movement."

Those responsible for Victoria leadership are not satisfied to lead, the effort is to broaden the gap.

"In the Secret Service," with J. Warren Kerrigan, is being filmed at Universal City, prepared for production by William Parker of the Universal staff.

The Right Kind of Publicity

PROBABLY the average man imagines that he is more intelligent than the average. That sounds like a paradox; but is is only a recognition of the commonest of human weaknesses, vanity and egotism. At any rate, the evidence indicates that most people underestimate the intelligence of those with whom they deal. To bring the moral home, it is quite likely that some producers (or their press agents) underestimate the intelligence of their exhibitors; and we know that a good many exhibitors do not make sufficient allowance for the perspicacity of the public.

Everybody is familiar with circus publicity, and loves it for its very ridiculousness—its violent hyperbole, its reckless alliterations, its general disregard for credulity. But nobody believes it. It is accepted as a part of the hiliarity and comedy of the occasion. There is no need for its credence; it serves its purpose in other ways.

Film publicity is different. It is a serious undertaking, demanding as thoughtful care as the publicity of a Marshall Field store or a Packard car. Superlative adjectives in the description of a feature picture fall without effect upon the calloused susceptibilities of the average reader. The press writers who use them fail to apply the test of their own approval. They judge their publicity efforts by the measure of clever writing, and not by the sensible appeal to their reason. Would the same effort, prepared by another writer, convince them? No, in a majority of cases. Then why assume that it will convince the public, or the exhibitors, unless the writer believes that his readers are less intelligent than he?

If the publicity writer for the manufacturer falls occasionally into this error, and serves his audience of exhibitors with a mess of adjectives in lieu of information, the exhibitor who prepares his own newspaper copy seems prone to attempt even the out-press-agenting of the press agent. Given an opportunity to get into the paper, he searches his brain—and the dictionary—for the most impressive words ever used to describe a picture. So highly decorated does his story become that its readers sense its origin at once; its very lavishness bespeaks a false and cold enthusiasm, of the kind that only the commercial spirit arouses.

Unless the exhibitor has, perchance, had newspaper experience himself, or is willing to make a conscientious study of advertising, the ready-prepared publicity supplied him by the film manufacturers is apt to be better than his own. Some of this still invites criticism, but a good deal of it is quite presentable, and in most cases is prepared by men thoroughly familiar with the habits of newspaper editors.

On this subject, a communication addressed to our "Forum" department asks why it is that the film manufacturer so gladly sends matrices, electrotypes, etc., free of charge and postage paid to any newspaper or magazine that asks, and then charges the exhibitor real money for the same supplies. It frequently happens, of course, that the exhibitor is in a better position to influence publication of this copy than is the manufacturer.

Since other exhibitors may have had the same thought, it may be worth while to point out that the primary purpose of the exhibitor is to advertise the theater and not the film. That is, he advertises the film only in connection with his own theater. The primary purpose of the producer, on the other hand, is to advertise the film and not the theater. Any advertisement which impresses the name of a particular theater upon the public eye benefits the film manufacturer only indirectly. It is distinctly local publicity, and there is no more reason why the manufacturer should pay any part of its expense than there is reason why Messrs. Proctor and Gamble should supply the plates for the local grocer's advertisement of Ivory soap.

The exhibitor is under no obligations to use plate matter supplied by the film makers if he does not wish to do so. Exhibitor advertising is important enough to justify careful study by the most interested party, who is the exhibitor himself. Any man intelligent enough to run a successful theater can learn to prepare his own advertising copy, and to give it an individuality that cannot be injected at long distance.

And even for the "reading notice" that the magnanimous newspaper editor allows to accompany paid advertising, the copy supplied by the manufacturer is intended only as a help to the exhibitor. We agree with the editor of "The Triangle" that a frank review by a regular member of the newspaper staff is the best sort of accompaniment to theater advertising.

Dictating the Admission Price

QUITE a few exhibitors are questioning the right of film producers to dictate the admission prices at which their biggest features may be shown to an eager public. Some have gone so far as to refuse to book certain features on that ground alone. They have refused to change the policy of their theater at what they considered the mandate of a manufacturer, who could of necessity know nothing of local conditions.

The legislative bodies of the United States right now are considering the question of maintenance of retail prices, which means the right of the manufacturer to dictate the retail, or resale, price of his goods. A great many things of everyday use are sold on that basis at present. We might mention Eastman Kodaks, Victor Victrolas, and any number of toilet and proprietary articles as illustrative of this practice. While there are some who oppose it, a great many authorities on economics contend vigorously that the principle of price dictation is eminently fair to all concerned.

The producer of films who specifies a certain admission price below which he will not allow his picture to be shown is merely setting the retail price. It is our impression that the legislature will establish his right to do so. Even in that event there will be some exhibitors who hold to the privilege of setting their own admission price in all cases. That specific right no one can deny them. They have merely to avoid booking any features whose dictated admission price conflicts with the one they have established and intend to maintain.

The situation hardly calls for "resentment," which is the word some exhibitors have employed in connection with it. No exhibitor should allow himself to forget that he and his fellows are the real purchasing power of the industry. No producer can demand—and secure—a higher price than usual unless a sufficient number of exhibitors are willing to pay that price. And so long as there are enough exhibitors who refuse to raise their admission prices, there will be enough producers to supply them with films—they may rest assured of that economic truth.

Looking at the matter as judiciously as we are able, and believing in the justice and equity of the fixed resale price, we are strongly inclined to acknowledge the right of the manufacturer to set a minimum admission price on his product. Whether or not he can get away with it is another question—and that, of course, is up to the exhibitor.

We think no producer will contend that his product is so good the exhibitor must have it. If the exhibitor himself is in so unfortunate a frame of mind as to believe he cannot get along without a certain brand or a certain feature, he will probably meet, under protest, all the conditions imposed. It is against him that the resentment of his fellows should be directed, and not against the producer.

No theater can hope to show all the good features and no theater which intends to maintain a ten cent admission price is obliged to aspire to pictures which stipulate a higher price.

If the pictures that insist upon a raised admission price are worth it they will succeed in spite of those who object to the system. If they are not worth it they will fail in spite of those who support them. That is about all there is to the question.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

ADMISSION prices in Ontario will probably within a short time be raised from ten to fifteen cents. On account of the war taxes the Exhibitors' Protective Association has decided on that move.

The Exhibitors' League of Philadelphia at a recent meeting decided to become a member of the United Business Men's Associations.

President R. S. Hyer of S. M. U. University at Dallas, Texas, has warned students against attending pictures and vaudeville performances.

B. F. Lyon, recently appointed district manager of exchanges of the International Film Service, Inc., is in Boston, where he will remain several weeks.

A Saturday afternoon fire in the Bellwood theater, Atlanta, Georgia, recently burned out the entire projection room. The audience passed out of the house in good order and no one was injured.

The Screen Club of Cleveland, Ohio, recently held a midnight frolic at the Olmstead. Reservations for more than one hundred were made. A banquet, cabaret and dancing were the features of the evening.

Frank L. Newman, manager of the Regent theater, Kansas City, Missouri, reports that his safe had been broken into and $673 in money taken. The negro janitor, who has disappeared, is being sought by the police.

"Intolerance" at the Liberty theater, New York, closed the first month of the engagement with every evidence of remaining at that playhouse for a longer period than Mr. Griffith's other success, "The Birth of a Nation."

"I'd give $500 if I could see 'The Little Girl Next Door,'" was the sign a blind man wore as he ambled along the streets of Lyons, Nebraska. Manager Clinberg of the Magnate theater hired him to do the stunt and it paid out.

The Nugget theater of Hanover, New Hampshire, had the student body of Dartmouth College decide for the management what pictures it should run. The greatest per cent of students and professors requested Paramount Pictures.

The high cost of living strikes everything—the latest is admission tickets. On account of the increased cost of paper the price of motion picture theater tickets, which was formerly thirty cents a roll, has been advanced to thirty-five cents.

Suburban Garden, an old-time aristocrat of St. Louis legitimate houses, has been purchased by G. W. Helmrich, president of the Mississippi Valley Motion Picture Corporation. The plan is to use the house as a part of the company's studio for the production of films.

The E. L. K. Film Company of Minneapolis has moved into its new quarters in the Film building, 16 North Fourth street. This company will now be under the management of Ben Rosenberg, who has purchased the interest of Harry Sodini.

The New Pickwick theater of Baltimore will hereafter show no pictures until they have been given a previous examination by the manager, G. Horton Gaffney. Lady ushers and a new stringed orchestra are other innovations at the Pickwick.

Bismarck Gardens, Chicago's most popular summer and winter gardens, will soon inject pictures into their exclusive and high-class entertainments. Beginning October 21 they will show the Florence Rose fashion films and some Pathe educationals—Tropical Birds and the Spanish Pyrenees—in color.

Two of Chicago's motion picture theaters on Michigan boulevard have closed their doors on the pictures and will be turned over to other forms of entertainment. Orchestra Hall will start the winter season of concerts and travelogue series, and the Fine Arts theater will hereafter be called "The Playhouse" and will show legitimate drama.

The De Luxe Film Company of Minneapolis, distributors in that territory of "Purity," gave a private showing of the film at the Strand theater, St. Paul, for the benefit of the Institute of Art of that city and the city council. A private showing will also be given at the Strand theater, Minneapolis, for the benefit of the Institute of Art of Minneapolis.

"The Birth of a Nation" began its second Chicago run on September 28 at the Colonial theater with the following scale of prices: Matinees, twenty-five cents to $1; nights, twenty-five cents to $1.50. The production is in charge of N. E. Fields, the house manager. "Intolerance" will hold the Colonial screen following the indefinite run of "The Birth of a Nation."

The Strand theater of New York last week presented Marie Doro in "The Lash." An interesting feature of the bill was the appearance of Raymond L. Ditmars, curator of the New York Zoological Park, who delivered a lecture to his motion pictures illustrating the intimate life of the wild animal and the evolution from the highest to the lowest type.

According to the Hon. T. W. McGarry, Provincial Treasurer, the amusement war tax in force in Ontario has been bringing in so far an average of $50,000 per month. This is well up to expectations, and some are confident that in the winter months the treasury will benefit to an even greater extent. The treasurer's estimate at the time the graded tax was initiated was that the annual revenue from the source would be $600,000.

Here is another boost in admission prices. The Majestic of Detroit has begun to charge twenty-five cents to all parts of the house on Sundays and holidays. The former prices were ten, fifteen and twenty-five cents. The advance in price did not result in the slightest decrease in patronage, and the receipts have been much higher since the change. The Majestic is one of the finest photoplay houses in the West.

Here is a novel method of attracting children patrons. Manager Samuel Greenberg of the Empire theater, Newark, N. J., secured the services of a ventriloquist and his talking dolls and distributed to the first three hundred children who were admitted to the theater toy wagons, dolls, horns, and other childish trinkets. The plan had the desired effect. Following the above introduction, the children like to come to the Empire.

"There has been a change in the kind of paper the public likes to see in front of a theater," says Samuel Sax, manager of the Princess theater of Portland, Oregon, and former manager of several other houses. He states that he finds even his foreign patrons of the laboring classes like clean and high-class films better than the blood and thunder type, and the old-time lurid posters do not pull the crowds as they formerly did.

The youngsters of Detroit won't kick on going to school after this. The board of education has authorized the purchase of five projection machines and a weekly film service will be given a try-out in twenty-five schools of the city. News films, travel pictures and those dealing with commercial and industrial subjects will be shown the pupils at regular intervals. The entire installation will cost $1,300. Non-inflammable film will be used.

Professor Firmin Swinnen, organist of the Antwerp Cathedral, one of the most celebrated edifices of its sort in Europe, has been engaged to play at the Rialto theater, New York City. Prof. Swinnen arrived in New York recently from England, where in a period of eleven months he raised $30,000 for the Belgian Relief Fund by a series of recitals in the noted English churches and cathedrals. Besides having perfect command of his chosen instrument, Prof. Swinnen is a composer and has published five books of Flemish songs.

Oliver Morosco will break ground next spring for a new picture theater in Chicago's downtown district. The new house is to be ultra-modern in every detail and will occupy a prominent corner, negotiations for which site are now being conducted with local real estate men. The proposed Chicago house is in line with Morosco's plan of controlling a string of theaters throughout the continent. He has already leased the theater in New York now in course of construction by Messrs. Lee and Schubert, and has also made plans to erect a theater in Boston.

The wage difference between the owners of moving picture theaters in Butte, Montana, and the operators of the film machines has been adjusted. The operators wanted $6 for eight hours' work and when they presented their demands the employers suggested a conference and several meetings were held with representatives of the union. The employers and the union representatives agreed upon a slightly higher rate than the present scale, but less than the union's request, and in turn, the operators made certain concessions desired by the owners of the theaters.

Eight hundred Ontario "fans" have promised to see at least one episode of "Liberty" in compliance with an idea worked out by the publicity department of the Universal Company of Toronto. Advertisements in the Sunday papers of Toronto notified the picture lovers that they could become members of the club without cost, and that in return they would receive a membership button and also be placed on the mailing list of the Bulletin, the Canadian weekly motion picture paper. Over 800 "fans" signified their intention of joining the club, agreeing to see one or more episodes of the serial, "Liberty" as an initiation degree.

Have you been introduced to the aucograph? This is an instrument for registering laughs—not provoking them, but counting them after they have been started. The aucograph is a machine with a sensitive needle which is set up in a motion picture theater chosen for a test, and which makes an accurate record of the duration and volume of laughter produced by a comedy film. The producer no longer has to trust to his own judgment. He can make a test of the mirthful disturbance caused by his comedy stuff just as the seismograph makes a record of the volume and duration of earth tremors in an earthquake.

Investigation of the strike of theater employes and actors at Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, by the state board of arbitration now in session, has developed that the strike in Oklahoma City was begun by the theater employes and operators of picture machines, and that the actors' organization, known as the White Rats, came into it after it was begun. F. J. Gilmore, traveling organizer of the actors' union, testified that the actors of the union's organization are contesting for fair contracts and elimination of evils in the booking offices. It is intimated by the actors that they are preparing to carry their cause to all the cities of the country, and that the beginning of the movement at Oklahoma City was because conditious were auspicious at this time.

In accordance with his usual custom of entertaining the kiddies at intervals, P. G. Cameron of the Crystal theater leased the Roseland theater at Dallas, Texas, September 16, and gave a free show to the school children. A suitable program was arranged and all of the little ones were made welcome from 9 A. M. till noon. In addition to an appropriate selection of comedy films, the first episode of the Universal special feature, "Liberty," was shown. This picture was very entertaining and pleased the children, as it showed Mexico as it is, and was, during the stirring times of war. The Roseland was packed to capacity and it was evident the youngsters enjoyed everything. The children all voted as having had the time of their lives.

Fire at Rolin Studio

Fire caused by spontaneous combustion came near destroying the new Rolin studio last week. The flames were discovered at eight o'clock in the morning by carpenters who were working on a new diffuser roof on the big stage. The alarm was sent in and several companies of Los Angeles firemen responded just in time to save the studio. All negative film was removed at the first cry of fire; however, one roll of newly made film was damaged by water.

The total damage amounts to about a thousand dollars.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

ARE you sure that your pictures are just as clear as they can be made with the facilities you have at hand? Are your patrons pleased with the service they are receiving in this respect? The clearness of the picture has a great deal to do with the popularity of your theater, much more than a great many exhibitors seem to realize. Have your projection machine thoroughly overhauled just so often to see that it is in perfect shape and no matter how good you know your operator to be watch to see that he gets the best results from the machine. Also have your screen cleaned now and then to help in this effort for the clearest pictures. The people come to your house to look at pictures and the easier it is to see them the more they enjoy the performance and the more often they will come.

74—Do you think it is safe to use these re-issued films they are offering quite a good many of now? They are a good deal cheaper than the new pictures and have the good actresses in them but I am afraid my people might think I was trying to put off old stuff on them and be sore about it.

I do not doubt but that as a steady diet your patrons might object to the re-issued films, but one shown now and then is a novelty and enjoyed as such. These films show some of the best actresses whose names are always good and will always draw, and then people are interested in comparing the work the players did two or three years ago with that they are doing now. It is also interesting to watch the photography and the settings and so forth and see how the industry has progressed in the last two or three years. You will find that there are a great many more people in your audience than you realize who are quite critical about these things, who like to analyze the films in this way and so enjoy an old one once in a while. I know a number of cases where these re-released pictures have been used and have drawn packed houses. This is not only because of the drawing power of the name of the star but also because of the curiosity to see how things used to be.

These films are very much cheaper than the new pictures in which these same players appear, but even at that they are much higher than they were at the time they were issued. In advertising these pictures in your program you might play up this very idea of coming to see the growth there has been in the talent of the actress and the handling of the production in two years.

It is not at all a bad idea either to use films which are rather old, in the way of having been out some time, as attractions on your program. Keep track of the pictures which draw the crowded houses and the audience seem to be especially enthusiastic about, and then after some time bring them back again. In almost every instance when this has been tried the people have received it with approval. It is like reading a good book over again after it has been laid aside for a while. All the pleasure of first seeing the picture is there and as is always the case on the second viewing many points are appreciated which were unnoticed before. You want to be very careful in trying this scheme, however, to bring back the films that you know will really be received with pleasure, for there are many that would not draw the second time.

75—I see that some of the picture houses in the city keep open all night. I have been wondering if that would be feasible in a small town. There are only two of us here and it is a pretty good sized town because there are a number of factories. There is not much for the young people to do except come to the theaters and they always stay until the last of the last performance. I used to close my house at ten o'clock but so many asked me to keep it open later that I now close at eleven, and they would stay until twelve every night if I kept open that long. And then the shifts in the factory are arranged so that the people are getting off all times of the night and I believe if I was open all night I could catch a lot of trade from these people. I believe they would be glad to stop in and have a little amusement on their way home from work or before they start in again. My theater is in a good location for this because a good many of the employees from two of the factories pass right by the door on their way to and from work.

When you first mentioned keeping a motion picture theater open all night in a small town I had visions of everyone in bed by ten o'clock and not a light in town except the blazing front of a motion picture theater which was running full blast to empty seats only. But under the circumstances I do not know but what you have hit upon a very good scheme and could make a good thing of this innovation. It certainly would be a novelty in the town and would attract a good deal of attention from that standpoint alone. If, as you say, the shifts are arranged so that the employees of the factories are coming and going all night so that the town itself is wide-awake at night, so to speak, I do not see why you could not keep the theater open to advantage, unless there should happen to be some city ordinance prohibiting anything of the sort. You are the one to judge whether or not the people are of a class that would spend the money to come to the show every night, or two or three nights a week, and whether they would care for the all-night show. The only way to tell for sure how it would work out is, of course, to try it. Give it a good tryout for a month—or even two—if it seems to be going along in pretty good shape.

Start out by distributing handbills to the workers as they leave the factories announcing that you are going to keep open all night to give pleasure to the factory workers. Get the town paper to give you a write-up on the novelty of the idea and also do some advertising in their pages. The very out-of-the-ordinary aspect of the scheme will give you a great deal of free advertising, for without a doubt everyone in the town will be talking about it. Give it a fair trial, long enough so that you will be able to judge whether the many that come at first out of curiosity will be steady patrons or not, and then estimate whether the added expenses deducted from your box office receipts leave you enough profit to make the plan worth while. Because you start is no reason you have to keep this up if it is not profitable. It is simple enough to close the theater at the regular time once more and simply state that there were not enough people to support the all-night proposition if such proves to be the case.

76—I do not believe any manager tries harder to please his patrons and give them just what they want than I do and yet I don't believe anyone has more kicks—or if they do they certainly have my sincere sympathy. It just seems impossible to please these people. First one comes to me and wants one thing and then another and wants something entirely different until I don't know which way to turn. If one person is satisfied the next person is decidedly dissatisfied. I do not know what the trouble is whether my patrons are harder to please than others or whether the fault is with me and I do not know how to run a theater. I have a splendid patronage, the house is full every night and still they kick and kick—but they come just the same.

As long as the people keep coming to your house I should not worry very much about the fear that you do not know how to run a theater. People are bound to find fault, they seem to rather enjoy it, and I guess every exhibitor is faced by the same problem of trying to please everyone when everyone wants something different.

If you feel that the people really do not like what you are choosing for them, why don't you try the scheme of letting them choose the program themselves for awhile? It will probably please them greatly and make them feel that you are at last really trying to give them just exactly what they do want. Also in a short time it may prove to them that you really are more competent to choose a program which will please the majority of the people than they are themselves. The novelty of being allowed to have just what they please will wear off after awhile and they will get tired of trying to decide themselves what they do want and will be only too glad to let you run your own theater. It may also open their eyes to the fact that it is not the easiest thing in the world to furnish a new and a universally pleasing program every night in the week for seven nights.

This may become a very complicated matter if it is not conducted judiciously. There are a number of ways it could be handled. For example, you might let the people vote for the player they would rather see than any other and each week have one picture in which the actor or actress receiving the most votes appears, or perhaps one picture of each of the three receiving the highest number of votes. Another way is to have them vote for the pictures themselves. Let the people tell what picture they have heard about or seen reviewed that they would like very much to have shown at this theater and then by the same method the two or three receiving the highest number of votes could be shown. One very good scheme was tried out by one manager in this respect, was very simple and at the same time it meant that some of the old favorites could be rebooked at a cheaper rate. This scheme was to ask them to vote on the pictures which had already appeared at the theater which they would like to see again, or which they had missed seeing at the time.

To carry this out distribute handbills freely over the neighborhood telling what the scheme is and carrying a list of the principal features which have already appeared at the theater. Also have these given out by the doorman to everyone entering the theater. You might allow the people to vote on four or five which they would like to see, or even as many as nine or ten. Tell them to put a check against the titles of the favored ones and allow every person purchasing a ticket to the theater for the next week to hand in one of the bills with their favorite marked.

I think you will find that the people will respond very readily to any of these methods or others that you might devise yourself and at the same time it will put an end to a good extent to the objections which they raise that you are not giving them what they want, for this plan will prove to them that you are conscientiously trying to give them just exactly what they desire.

77—Do you think it is good policy to use the write-ups which the film companies sent out for your newspaper publicity work? Or would you use the space for advertising your own theater?

I must admit that a good deal of the material sent out by the publicity editors of the film companies is composed mostly of superlatives and chaff, but some of it is very fine. There are so many papers and magazines which run columns of notes about the plays and players that the public gets a good deal of this matter and I do not believe they are as interested as they used to be, unless it is real news, and told in a real information-giving manner. They are interested in the players and in little personal sketches of what they are doing and what they are interested in and also like to know something about the films which you are going to show at your theater, but I think the best place to use these items is to run a department in your house organ for them and not use up your newspaper space by running them in the reading matter. Of course, the publicity men have to send out just so much material every week and probably it is hard to always find enough to fill the allotted space, but if they would give us straightforward "dope" about the things and not have every film labeled as "the most wonderful film ever produced," and every actress the "best known actress," or "the most popular actress on the American screen," and the "largest sets constructed in producing this play ever put up in a studio," we would appreciate it. The public are as wise as we are and they know that these tales are a good share publicity hyperbole and so do not take much stock in the reports and are losing their interest in reading them. If you do use these items you have to tone them down a great deal to make them sound logical. It seems as though there must be a great many things of real interest happening around the studios relating to the players and the productions that would make interesting reading if we could only get this instead of so much chaff. Where the different scenes were taken, the vicissitudes of the company while it was being filmed, any news about the gowns worn by the actresses, or things of this sort are real news and do help to interest the people in the picture. For example, if a picture was taken in some part of the country which is scenically beautiful the people who had personally visited those spots would be more interested in the film if they knew it was taken in that location. If they knew that one of the players was nearly injured in some daring scene and just how it happened they would watch for that scene.

The hints which the companies send out to aid the theaterman in attracting people to his theater are splendid and can be made use of to good advantage. These are the real stuff. If you cannot use the "stunt" as suggested you can at least get ideas from it and adapt it to your own needs.

The advertising space which you have in the newspapers is best used in advertising your house in relation to the film shown. You know your people and what attracts them. Take this publicity matter which is sent out with the film and study it to see what information it contains which would add to the drawing power of the film in your own theater and embody that in your advertisement. The aim of the film companies is all right in this matter. They are striving to help the exhibitor in his publicity work and do to a large extent, but they could be more helpful by not being quite so enthusiastic in their descriptions and giving more facts and less fiction.

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT

Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

NOTE—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of MOTOGRAPHY, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

Submitting Synopses Only

BY GILSON WILLETS

Staff Writer Selig Company

WITHIN the past year the photoplay market has opened for the synopsis only. In other words, film editors are willing to consider and pay a reasonable price for plot ideas not prepared in regular scenario form. The prices range from twenty-five dollars to much larger sums, whatever the idea is deemed worth by the film manufacturer. Submitting your plot ideas by synopsis is not so easy as it would appear. There is art in preparing these synopses properly. They should be typewritten on good white paper and made as brief as possible, taking clearness into consideration. Fine writing should have no place in motion picture synopses. They should carry a title, a cast of characters (as few characters as is possible) and then the story should be plainly and clearly told. The climaxes and final ending should all be incorporated.

Above all, avoid "word paintings" when preparing motion picture synopses. The sun and the beautiful moon have performed noble service in short stories and novels, but descriptive writing cannot be photographed and so should be eliminated. Remember, also, that dialogue cannot be filmed and it is unnecessary to carry dialogue in your photoplay synopsis.

Submitting by synopsis is the easier way but if one wishes to learn the true art of photoplay writing, one should endeavor to write detailed scripts. They bring the most remuneration, if accepted, and necessitate the most skill.

The art of photoplay writing should be considered a distinct profession and as dignified and as difficult work as the writing of fiction. In fact, we know many novelists and short story writers who have failed at writing photoplays. They insist on word pictures when it is action pictures exclusively that are desired.

As I have previously stated, in order to learn to write one must practice writing. If you can join the repertorial staff of some newspaper the training will be beneficial. A majority of leading writers in every line were once newspaper men and women.

Copyrights and Adaptations

A GREAT many writers do not seem to understand the rules of the game regarding copyrighted work. Only too often is a letter received saying "I have just read a magazine story which would make a good photoplay and I am going to change it into one." They seem to have no conception of any infringement on the rights of anyone in so doing.

If these people were told of a man who saw a bench in a friend's house which he thought would make such beautiful chairs and could easily be changed a little and made over into two chairs and so took the bench home with him, sawed it in two, put on some arms, painted it a different color, and sold it as two separate chairs, they would be scandalized. They would say "Why, that man was a thief!" What else, to speak in plain language, is the person who takes another's idea, changes it a little, and sells it as something belonging to him—something which he created himself. The fact that a person pays fifteen cents for a copy of a magazine does not mean that he has a right to appropriate all the stories in that magazine, which probably represent the work of months and years on the part of the author, and a great expenditure on the part of the publishing company. If you consider yourself too upright and honest to steal a man's purse, then be too upright and honest to steal his plot.

If you do find a story that you believe would make a good adaptation then go about it in the right way. Write to the publisher and ask for permission to picturize the story, giving the author credit for the story and yourself credit for the adaptation. If the publisher has full rights on the story he will give you his price for the motion picture rights. If the author has retained the motion picture rights, as very many do nowadays, the publisher will probably refer you to the author or take the matter up with him themselves. Some publishers are kind enough, even though the author has not maintained the picture rights, to turn all extra revenue of this kind over to him, and in this case you would be referred to the writer direct.

If you have had published a short story which you would yourself like to adapt and on which you did not retain the motion picture rights, most publishers will be glad to grant you this privilege, simply requesting that if possible the magazine be mentioned on the screen as having printed the original story.

Works on which the copyrights have expired may be used by anyone. The stringent rule that you shall not take an idea outright or even take an idea and change it a little and call it your own must not be misinterpreted to mean that the thoughts which come to you when you are reading a story cannot be made use of. Every new idea which is brought to you while reading will probably beget a corresponding idea in your own mind. You have a perfect right to get themes from anything which you read, but those themes must be developed with your own original ideas and not those borrowed from the brain of another.

As a general rule adaptations are not for the outside writer. If a film company wants a picture based on a book or a short story they would in almost every case rather have the work done by their own staff writers, who are thoroughly conversant with their facilities, their limitations and their general ways of doing things. If the author himself wants to adapt his story for the screen that is a different matter, but for the free lance writer to attempt to picturize the work of another is rather a hopeless task from the selling standpoint. What the film companies want from the free lance writers is not the ideas of someone else, but their own. What they want from the outside is original, fresh ideas. They have plenty of people on their own staff who can work over stories. Your value to the film company is as a creator of new themes, original situations and strong scenes.

In making an adaptation of a story or book every writer will have his own method of working it out. A very simple method is to read the story over carefully to become fully acquainted with the plot and the characters. Then go over it again and as you read jot down the principal situations; never mind the little ones leading up to these big situations but simply the crises of the plot. The next step is to see that the events are arranged in chronological order, which they very seldom are in a story and must be for the film. After these are arranged estimate the number of reels you think the action of the story will allow. Do not try to make as many as possible but decide on the number that will be absolutely necessary to show all the action of the plot and still have each reel full of strong, live stuff. The next step is to arrange the big situations so that they will be divided about evenly among the reels. You do not want the first two reels to be crowded with big crises, the third and fourth have nothing much happening, and then in the fifth one crises tumbling over another. Arrange them so that they will work up steadily and evenly to your climax. After this division of the story has been made the technique is just the same as applied to any photoplay.

It is not necessary in making an adaptation to follow closely the story as written; in fact, in many cases it will be found that so much description and conversation is used in a story that it is necessary to interpolate a good deal of action to make it move along quickly and with a punch. But do not spoil the story as so often is done by changing the climax entirely in an effort to make the proverbially they-lived-happily-ever-after ending which seems to be so universally popular on the screen. If the story was strong as written it will be strong as filmed, and why weaken it by changing the original idea?

Where to Sell

American Film Company, Santa Barbara, Calif.—In the market for only such stories as are capable of making feature plays of five reels or more. Do not care for worked-out scenarios, a detailed synopsis being alone sufficient. Not at present in the market for western stories nor those calling for costumes.

Arrow Film Corporation, Times Building, New York.—Arrow is committed to clean plays and does not believe in the exploitation of sex. Arrow does want clean, healthy, American dramas, portraying problems of every-day American life. Arrow is not committed to a policy of fitting its plays to its stars, but casts its pictures after they are completed in scenario form. It writes all its own scenarios, sometimes rewriting scenarios it buys from outsiders; but usually writes its own scenarios from start to finish from complete working synopses. Arrow also is committed to a policy of allowing its features to run their natural length, its scenarios not, in any case, being marked with reel endings. These divisions are taken care of in the final assembling and cutting of its pictures, not in the scenarios. Arrow will produce pictures from five-reel final length upward: it does not want shorter length pictures except in serial form. Comedies are not acceptable unless they are exceptional in character, slap-stick being utterly barred. To tell all this briefly: Arrow wants complete synopses of clean, American, modern drama, feature length, five reels and upward; no comedy or one or two-reel subjects except fourteen to sixteen-episode serials.

California Motion Picture Corporation, San Francisco, California.—Not at present in the market for photoplays of any description, as we are only doing adaptations of books and stage plays, and have enough material already contracted for to keep us busy for a long time to come, so far as our feature productions are concerned. However, this company is contemplating the production of one and two-reel comedies, and will probably have, at least, two comedy companies working here before very long; and then we shall be in the market for one- and two-reel comedies, and will pay really good prices for original, humorous plots; worked out into practical photoplay form and cleanly-told synopses. We shall not attempt any "slap-stick" or vulgar comedies, but only those of a grade that will appeal to normal, grown-up audiences.

Thomas A. Edison, Inc., 2826 Decatur Ave., Bedford Park, N. Y.—Not buying at present.

E. & R. Jungle Film Company, Inc., Los Angeles, Calif.—In the market for one-reel chimpanzee comedies written for Sally and Napoleon, also two-reel comedies and dramas. Also have a large collection of rare animals such as lions, leopards, pumas and innumerable kinds of monkeys and would like scripts in which they can be utilized.

Famous Players Film Company, 124 West Fifty-sixth street, New York.—In market for five-reel features suitable for their stars, Marguerite Clark, Pauline Frederick, Hazel Dawn, etc. A good working synopsis of the themes is sufficient. We give decisions promptly and pay the market prices immediately upon acceptance. Just now we are only in need of ideas which call for modern characters in American locations.

Fine Arts Film Company, 4500 Sunset Blvd., Los Angeles, Calif.—In market for five-reel stories suitable for any of its stars: Douglas Fairbanks, Mae Marsh, Bobby Herron, Lillian Gish, Norma Talmadge, Wilfred Lucas, Fay Tincher, Bessie Love, Olga Grey and Constance Talmadge. Two or three of these players usually appear in the same picture. Most of the feminine stars are ingenues, and stories in which the principal character is a young girl are especially desired. Each story should have an underlying theme of considerable power. Historical stories are not desired. Will also make two-reel comedies for the Triangle program. Light comedy-dramas are preferred. Simply synopsis of story desired, and in submitting same when possible state price desired for the story.

Fox Film Corporation, 130 West Forty-sixth street, New York, N. Y.—Always in market for good, strong, five-reel modern dramas, comedy dramas or good western stories, same to be submitted in five or six page synopsis form.

International Film Service, Inc., 729 Seventh Ave., New York City.—Are not considering any material from outside writers.

Juvenile Film Corporation, 110 West Fortieth street, New York, N. Y.—Are looking for wholesome children stories with a vein of comedy and in which all the principal parts would be taken by children. If grown-up support is necessary it should be limited to as few characters as possible.

Pallas-Morosco Company, Los Angeles, Calif.—Offers to pay $1,500 each for complete stories adapted to its needs or upon which a complete photoplay may be founded. Story may be either in synopsis form of from 500 to 2,000 words each, or may be in the form of a book, magazine or short story. Especially desirous of obtaining stories adapted to Vivian Martin, Dustin Farnum, Myrtle Stedman, Kathlyn Williams and Lenore Ulrich.

Pathe Exchange, 25 West Forty-fifth street, New York, N. Y.—In the market now for ideas for serials and is willing to pay a liberal price for any ideas that meet its requirements. Pathe looks to the trained writer for material for the young writer has only a vague idea of the great amount of action that is required for a thirty-reel serial.

Rialto Film Corporation, 218 West Forty-second street, New York, N. Y.—In the market for synopses only for five-reel feature photoplays dealing with modern life or sociological and psychological subjects. After reading the synopsis and if acceptable, will then arrange for the reading of the complete scenario.

Vitagraph Company, E. 15th Street and Cortelyou Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.—Are bought up far ahead on three, four and five-reel dramas and are in the market at the present time for one-reel comedies only.

World Film Corporation, 130 W. 46th Street, New York City—In the market for good stories of any kind with sufficient material for five reels. Synopses preferred.

Richard Bennett in a New One

MUTUAL SCHEDULE FOR OCT. 9 HEADED BY BENNETT AND FLORENCE TURNER

Richard Bennett in "Philip Holden—Waster," a Mutual Star production, released [illegible] to first run houses October 9.

THAT eminent actor from the stage, Richard Bennett, in a finely handled screen production, "Philip Holden—Waster," heads the schedule of Mutual Film Corporation's releases for the week beginning October 9. This Mutual star production appears on Monday of that week.

"Philip Holden—Waster" is a re-title for the drama, "His Brother's Keeper," which was written for Mr. Bennett by Kenneth B. Clarke before the star's journey out to the coast, and which, from the first announcement of Mr. Bennett's present contract with the Mutual, was named as the vehicle for his second Mutual star production.

"The Sable Blessing," which was intended for Mr. Bennett's premier in Mutual star productions, and was announced as such, was delayed before release, however, and postponed until a later date. Thus "Philip Holden—Waster" will mark the popular player's first appearance in pictures since the famous "Damaged Goods," over a year ago.

In "Philip Holden—Waster," Kenneth B. Clarke, the author, has contrived for Mr. Bennett one of the most delightful character portrayals and some of the most naively charming situations, which at the same time contain all the thrill, the suspense and surprise element necessary for a compelling drama, which have ever found their way to the screen.

"Philip Holden—Waster" is the story of a young litterateur, who finds himself suddenly confronted with a love affair and the necessity for earning his own living at the same time. The success which meets his efforts at bread winning, when once he gets his mind turned in that direction, is most unique and startling. He plays rousing revenge on the friends who had laughed at his absent-mindedness before his business awakening.

Mr. Bennett is supported by an exceptionally able cast, including Rhea Mitchell, Adrienne Morrison (Mrs. Richard Bennett), George Periolat, Clarence Burton and Orral Humphrey.

A second Mutual star production will go out from the Mutual during the week of October 9. Florence Turner, whose previous Mutual productions have charmed the country, will appear October 12, in "Redeemed."

"Redeemed," as the former of Miss Turner's Mutual releases, was produced by Larry Trimble, the capable master of production detail, who began his career as a writer, then used his knowledge and the results of applied study on psychology to the larger field of motion picture art.

The plot of "Redeemed" contains all the elements of drama which bring out the best and strongest response from Miss Turner. It is a vital story of throbbing human interest, tense moments, big surprises. In it is reflected the best work of both Miss Turner and her director.

On Monday, October 9, a very unusual drama of two-reel length, featuring Winnifred Greenwood and Edward Coxen, entitled "Citizens All," will be released.

In this screen story is combined a touching plot with an amusing combination of whimsical characters, colored by the good old red, white and blue of its patriotic background.

It is the story of the reconciliation of a stubborn old German music teacher and of a still more obstinate French fencing master over the cradle of their grandchild, the young parents of which had run away and married in spite of their fathers' objections. The cause of the disagreement of the two old foreigners had been the merits of their native lands. With the reconciliation, the hatchet is buried in the good old U. S. A., and they become citizens, all.

Miss Greenwood and Mr. Coxen, in the roles of the younger members of the respective families, are supported by Clarence Burton as the German music teacher, George Field as the French fencing teacher, and Louise Lester as the landlady.

On Friday, a second two-part drama will find its way to the public.

"At the Edge of the Aqueduct" is its title, and in picturesqueness of setting and in convincing plot, it is one of the best dramas of short story length which has ever proceeded from the studios of the Thanhouser Company.

The story deals with the love affair of a young school teacher, the engineer at work on the aqueduct, and a jealous farmer, president of the school board.

The regular weekly Beauty comedy of the week appears on Tuesday, October 10. John Sheehan, Carol Halloway, John Steppling, Vera Sissons, Robert Klein, "Citizens All," a new American-Mutual with Winnifred Greenwood and Edward Coxen.

The quaint and lovable characters of "The Crisis," come to life in Selig's big production, owned by Harry Sherman.

Dick Rosson and Earl Montgomery, old favorites of the Mutual will be seen in this two-reel funny picture entitled "That Sharp Note."

It is a picture mix-up of diplomatic relations between a group of warring and neutral nations, with a note to the "Flyser," which gets sadly tossed and turned in the sending.

Ben Turpin and Rube Miller, up to their usual high water mark in the perpetrating of funny comedy situations, will be seen in a two-reel Vogue on Saturday, October 15, entitled, "Ducking a Discord."

There are funny situations a plenty, as well as the real thrill, which always accompanies these "slap sticks with a reason," which come from the hands of these two popular comedians.

There will be three one-reel comedies of "Cub" brand on the Mutual's program for the second week in October. "Inoculating Hubby" will appear on Friday, October 13. "Those Primitive Days" and "Their College Capers" will go to the public on Saturday, October 14.

The usual release of Mutual current news, Mutual Weekly, No. 93, will appear on Wednesday, October 11, as will "See America First" and Harry Palmer's Kartoon Komics, in split reel.

The Mutual's magazine in film, "Reel Life," will be released on its regular day, Sunday, and will contain interesting material of pertinence to today's business and educational activities.

Thanhouser to Release "Hidden Valley"

A different sort of a drama, with beautiful and absorbing scenes laid in South Africa, is "Hidden Valley," starring Valkyrien (Baroness DeWitz), which will be released by Thanhouser through Pathe in November.

Valkyrien, the beautiful Danish dancer, plays the part of the "white goddess" of a wild tribe of ostrich hunters. The "goddess," an American girl, has been captured by the natives, who are about to sacrifice her to their water god when aid arrives in the person of a young New Yorker, played by Boyd Marshall.

The feature was directed by Ernest Warde and the South African scenes, notable for artistic photography, were made in Florida. Mr. Warde himself plays the part of the high priest of the savage tribe.

Owing to the frequent necessity of making vision scenes for the photoplays at Universal City, in order to save time, trouble and expense, a special vision stage has been constructed at the well-known motion picture plant.

"The Crisis" a Record Production

The judgment of H. A. Sherman, president of Sherman-Elliott, Inc., in paying $250,000 for the entire rights for the United States and Canada for "The Crisis," has been more than vindicated by the number of applications that have been received for the state rights to this remarkable picture.

"The Crisis" already has created a stir among the film men who have seen this remarkable screen drama. Winston Churchill, the author of the book and the screen drama, has expressed himself as more than delighted with the production given his mind creation, and the master drama of the screen is bound to equal the book in popularity. The novel has been re-issued by Grossett and Dunlap of New York in a fifty-cent edition, illustrated with stills from the Selig production.

Unicorn Releases Three Reel Dramas

On October 9 the Unicorn Film Service Corporation will again start releasing three-reel dramas as well as two-reel comedies of a superior type. The major portion of the new program will be made up of new films while the smaller portion will consist of re-issues.

J. E. Willis, who is giving the Chicago office his personal attention, when seen by a representative of Motography, said: "To insure exhibitors booking our service, a program of select pictures all uniformly balanced, we insist upon a screen showing of each picture before we purchase it; in this way we are able to separate the sheep from the goats, keeping the operating costs down, which is reflected in the low rental price we ask."

"Ike" Schlank, formerly vice president and general manager, has secured absolute control of the corporation and is planning to make a number of changes in the policies of the company, purposed to give a more complete service to exhibitors than has before been available to them.

J. E. Willis advises that he has received the first consignment of new paper and invites all exhibitors to call and inspect it at the offices on the fifth floor of the Mallers building, Chicago.

Vosburgh and Allen with Morosco

The two latest acquisitions to the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company studios are Alfred Vosburgh, the handsome leading man, and Estelle Allen, the clever ingenue whose work under Vitagraph, Ince, Edison and other trade marks will well be remembered.

Vitagraph Purchases "Within the Law"

16,000 NEW YORKERS SEE FIRST SHOWING OF SOTHERN IN "THE CHATTEL"

GREATER VITAGRAPH promises another treat for the motion picture loving public and another big money-getter for the exhibitor in its announcement that it has purchased from Selwyn & Company, the producers, the motion picture rights of "Within the Law," the big melodrama which was such a wonderful stage success.

"Within the Law" opened the Eltinge Theater in New York in September, 1912, and ran two solid seasons. The following year twelve road companies went on tour with the play, with such stars as Jane Cowl, Margaret Illington and Helen Ware playing the same part at the same time. It was produced in London and remained on the boards there for a solid year, and also was a great success in Spain.

"Within the Law" is a dramatic exposition of the subtle manipulation of the laws to serve evil ends. It shows how criminal parasites, criminally disposed live successfully and affluently and still remain "within the law." Cropping out from the main story is a preachment against a capital that underpays its hirelings and forces them into dishonesty. Mr. Veiller, the playwright, has not hesitated to take his fling at department store methods, whereby shop girls are compelled to stand on their feet nine hours a day for a wage too small to allow them ordinary necessities.

Sothern at Showing of "The Chattel"

"The Chattel," the Greater Vitagraph production which marks the first appearance on the screen of E. H. Sothern, was shown to five capacity audiences, 16,000 people in all, at the Strand Theater, New York.

On Sunday evening after "The Chattel" had been presented, the spotlight was turned on Mr. Sothern seated in a box with Commodore and Mrs. J. Stuart Blackton, Miss Julia Marlowe, Miss Peggy Hyland and her mother. Mr. Sothern arose and paid a wonderful tribute to the motion pictures as an art and to the Vitagraph Company as one of the most efficient organizations it has ever been his pleasure to come in contact with. He quickly disposed of the theory that the actor who steps from the stage on to the studio floor has nothing to learn, and in this connection lauded the work of Miss Hyland, who plays the part of Mr. Sothern's wife in "The Chattel," and also publicly thanked Fred Thomson, his director, for valuable lessons gained in motion picture acting.

The Stillman Theater, Cleveland, Ohio, was opened on September 29 with "The Chattel." The opening of this fine new theater was by invitation only, no tickets being sold. The Stillman has contracted for the three Sothern pictures which Greater Vitagraph will release.

W. H. McCoy Supervises Camera Experts

Recognizing the importance of photography in the production of fine motion pictures, the Vitagraph Company has appointed W. H. McCoy superintendent and put him in charge of its score of expert camera operators. Mr. McCoy is an expert qualified to work out some great improvements in service and equipment for this company. He joined Vitagraph nine years ago as a mechanic and has been constantly rising until he attained his present position. As both an artistic and mechanical expert Mr. McCoy is depended upon to make constant improvements in the camera department. He is not only a student of lenses and camera mechanism, but of lighting effects and opportunities for novelties in working out the spirit of photoplay manuscripts.

Magazine Approves Productions

In keeping with its policy of offering the public clean, wholesome entertainment and never making a film of which it is ashamed, the Vitagraph Company of America has the honor of receiving the stamp of approval of the Better Films Department of The Woman's Home Companion, conducted by Miss Helen Duey.

Among the Vitagraph films which Miss Duey has endorsed in the Woman's Home Companion during the last three months are: "Fathers of Men," "Hesper of the Mountains," "His Wife's Good Name," "The Alibi," "The Kid," "The Dawn of Freedom," "The Chattel" and "The Blue Envelope Mystery."

Although totally lacking in sensual scenes, every one of the above named productions afford interesting entertainment and have proven good box-office investments to the exhibitors who have shown them.

Conan Doyle's Story to Be Filmized

"The Firm of Girdlestone," by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, is the first of several excellent London-made productions to appear on the Greater Vitagraph program. This will be released October 9 as a Blue Ribbon feature, with Charles Rock and Edna Flugrath as the stars.

Mr. Rock, well known through his stage successes in "The Whip," "Grumpy," "The Sins of Society," etc., plays the part of John Girdlestone. Miss Flugarth, who has had a stage career that began when she was quite a young girl, and is an old Edison player, takes the role of Kate Harston, Girdlestone's ward.

Harold Bolster Made Business Manager

President Albert E. Smith has appointed Harold Bolster as business manager of the Greater Vitagraph Company. Mr. Bolster will relieve President Smith of much of the detail involved in the increased responsibility of the enlarged company. The new business manager has been with the company for over a year engaged in constructive work as assistant to the executives.

H. D. Naugle, formerly Los Angeles manager, has been appointed to the position of coast division manager and will have under his jurisdiction the V-L-S-E offices in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Denver, Seattle, and the sub-office at Salt Lake City.

H. M. Lentz, Los Angeles salesman, has been appointed to the position of assistant branch manager and will take entire charge of the Los Angeles office whenever Mr. Naugle is visiting the other division exchanges.

G. A. Faris has been made branch manager at Seattle.

"Eleven to One" is the title of a two-reel drama being filmed by Director George Cochrane at Universal City.

Big New Helen Holmes Serial

In "A Lass of the Lumberlands," the fifteen-chapter photodrama of timber life, which Signal is making for release by the Mutual Film Corporation, October 23, Helen Holmes says she has found the biggest and best of all the vehicles which have conveyed her acts of daring to the moving picture public. President Hutchinson of the Signal Corporation says it is the most pretentious effort thus far made by that producing house.

The setting of the story is something new in photoplay—the lumbering industry in its native home, the great, snow-mantled pine woods. From that silent scenery the action of the story extends out into the world of Big Business, on to the Capitol at Washington, and even invades the grave precincts of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"A Lass of the Lumberlands" abounds in realism. The audience sees giant trees of the forest crashing to the lumberman's axe, watches the laying down of a corduroy railroad on the frozen snow, the loading of the huge logs and the hauling of them to the stream side, there to be floated down to market. Real log jams form before the spectator's eyes, and he sees the key-log blown up with a charge of dynamite set off beneath the water. Helen is seen leaping with her babe from log to log of the big jam—to be hurled into the stream with the going off of the dynamite.

In the closing scene of the first episode of this remarkable picture Helen is whirled away in the rapids, clinging with one arm to a log and holding with the other her baby. She is carried swiftly past a rocky point where the widowed squaw of Lazy Dog, Indian chief murdered by Holmes and hurled over a cliff, mourns with her infant son beside the broken body of her dead.

Another big scene in this Mutual picture shows Helen Holmes, her hand on the throttle, guiding a logging locomotive at express speed over the swaying rails of the corduroy, the snow bed bending beneath.

"Daughter of the Gods" Shown

After three months' labor expended in titling and assembling the picture and arranging and timing the elaborate musical score, "A Daughter of the Gods," the big Fox production in which Annette Kellermann is featured, will be presented for the first time on October 17, at the Lyric Theater, New York. Mr. Fox yesterday decided definitely on this date.

One of the delectable Jamaican scenes in "A Daughter of the Gods."

By the time of the first performance the picture will have been fourteen months in the making. The scale of expenditure was staggering, and the results were so remarkable that the mere rumor of them has caused extraordinary public curiosity. Although twenty times as much film was taken as is usable in an evening's entertainment, nevertheless the scenes showing each of the sensational feats of Miss Kellermann have been retained. "A Daughter of the Gods," it is said, will offer the quadruple themes of Greek myth, Oriental romance, marine adventure and land battle, but developed in a strongly unified story instead of in parallel streams of action. It will thus add a further contribution to the bewilderingly new technique of the motion picture.

SERIAL NOW A FEATURE

Billie Burke-Kleine Serial Can Now Be Booked by Exhibitors as Feature Attraction of Four to Eight Reels

A brand-new plan for the booking of the George Kleine motion picture novel "Gloria's Romance" is now in effect at all the Kleine exchanges. Exhibitors, instead of booking the picture in twenty chapters, are now permitted to play the attraction as a feature offering, running four chapters or eight reels per night, for a period of five weeks.

One Kleine manager in talking of the new booking plan said: "Several houses in my territory are doing twice the business they did on the first run of the picture by staging a Billie Burke Revue. I have found that the film as a revue offers a most attractive 'buy' for the exhibitor who never runs serials but is a strong believer in big feature shows. By booking the "Gloria's Romance Revue" he can give five of the best feature shows he could obtain anywhere and each night advertises those which are to come, thus reducing his advertising expense, for he can spend more money on his first announcement of the booking of five such tremendous features and cover all five showings of the picture. The mere announcement of Billie Burke in five eight-reel performances is a sure box-office magnet and the most optimistic estimates of the business which can be done are far exceeded in almost every case. Of course for the exhibitor who has not previously shown Billie Burke in 'Gloria's Romance' the opportunity for big money is just as great as for the man who has already run the picture as a twenty-chapter picture novel and is now re-showing it as five eight-reel features."

Better Pictures for Cleveland

The Cleveland Federation of Women's Clubs has started on its new year of work and will put its main strength on the better film movement again this season.

Neighborhood groups pledged to help by supporting motion picture programs arranged by the federation committee, will be formed in twenty-five localities, to give the work a city-wide character.

Besides the working for better pictures the women will also turn their attention to the city's methods of cleaning sidewalks, the building restriction code, and working out a practical plan to keep in touch with city legislation.

Pearl White in New Military Serial

PATHE'S BIG SERIAL "THE SHIELDING SHADOW" BREAKING RECORDS

PATHE will present a new serial of a military character on November 12 when Pearl White will be seen as an American Joan of Arc in "Pearl of the Army." To obtain the true atmosphere of Uncle Sam's land forces in the picture Guy W. McConnell, the author, has spent a great deal of his life studying army conditions from the viewpoint of the enlisted men, of the officer and also the departmental men. In the preparation of his story he has had the active co-operation and advice of some of the country's greatest military experts. This military aspect will prove especially important just now, when everyone is interested in war in all its phases.

In the cast supporting Miss White are Ralph Kellard, whose excellent work in "The Shielding Shadow" and several Pathe Gold Rooster plays is attracting widespread attention, Theodore Friebus, W. T. Carleton, and Marie Wayne.

The serial is being produced by the Astra Film Corporation under the direction of Edward Jose. Mr. Jose is in no small measure responsible for the success of the Astra Film Corporation. Every Astra official is capable of doing his share of the work. This is the principle on which the company is built. That its ideas are sound can be seen in the following statement from Mr. Gasnier:

"In line with the policy of Pathe, we are adding to the forces of the Astra Company some of the best directors and actors in the country. We have also constantly in mind the importance of good stories. The better class of motion pictures being produced today has educated the public to expect higher and higher standards. We are making every effort to meet the demand and we feel safe in saying that in 'The Shielding Shadow' and 'Pearl of the Army' we have produced two serials which do so."

According to the policy set down by J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of the Pathe Exchange, a national newspaper and billboard campaign will be inaugurated to create business for the exhibitor. The National Sunday Magazine with a circulation of over 2,000,000 will publish the story in addition to scores of other newspapers throughout the country.

"The Shielding Shadow"

J. A. Berst is greatly pleased with the reports received from Pathe's thirty branches on the bookings for "The Shielding Shadow." He says this serial which was released October 1, was booked in advance to better houses at higher prices and with longer runs than any previous serial issued by "The House of Serials." The reports of advance bookings are almost exclusively those in the larger houses of the country. With the first-run houses lined up for the showing of this picture, under the direction of C. R. Seelye, business manager, all of the exchanges are now booking the second and third run theaters.

Pathe Program for October 8

The Pathe Program for the week of October 8 contains a five-part Gold Rooster play "The Pillory," made by the Thanhouser. Florence La Badie is the star in this production and shares her honors with Nellie Spaulding; the second episode of "The Shielding Shadow," two reels, which is remarkable for the scenes in which Jerry Carson is dragged into the depths of the sea by a giant octopus; the 13th chapter of "The Grip of Evil," two reels; "The Sword of Damocles," a two-reel drama; "Heinie and the 400," a rough and tumble comedy; "U. S. Customs Inspection," one reel educational; and Pathe news Nos. 82 and 83.

"The Test" Booking Heavily

"The Test," the Pathe Gold Rooster Play directed by George Fitzmaurice, and produced by Astra, is being booked very heavily by the various Pathe Exchanges. The critics are lauding this play in their reviews which is contributing to the success of the film. Louella A. Parson, critic of the Chicago Herald says: "'The Test' is one of those plays which makes one feel thankful for moving pictures. It is an A. H. Woods production with a theme as revolting as one can imagine but after I had seen the Pathe production I marveled at the beautiful screen play which had sprung from a muddy, unwholesome idea. It was almost like an exquisite rose bursting into full bloom in a dirty alley filled with rubbish."

Rather chilly for mermaids? Oh, not at all, out along the sunset edge of the Sunshine State. Below on the sand is "Luke" surveying his sirens, all of whom you have had in your house—on your screen, of course—in the Pathe-Rolin comedies. May Cloy is the blonde blusher at the left, and Bebe Daniels is playing right end on this All-Mermaid eleven.

"The Challenge" an Astra Adaptation

Donald Mackenzie, director for the Astra Film Corporation after almost a year's work on "The Shielding Shadow," Pathe's serial, is beginning work on "The Challenge," a five-reel adaptation of A. H. Woods' play of the same name by Bertram Millhauser. The lead of this feature will be played by Helen Chadwick, a "find" made by Louis J. Gasnier, president of the Astra. The cast will include Charles Gotthold, Montagu Lose and Ben Hendricks.

Big New England Bookings

In line with Pathe's policy of expansion, E. J. Farrell, the new manager of the Boston office has started to put into execution his campaign for one hundred per cent efficiency in service to New England exhibitors. He has booked "The Shielding Shadow" and all Gold Rooster Plays, beginning with "The Test," into the 4,000-seat Boston Theater. Also at least fifty houses in Boston will run "The Shielding Shadow."

In Springfield, he has booked all Gold Rooster plays to Fox's Theater, and "The Shielding Shadow," first run to the big Broadway Theater.

He has also closed New Britain for "The Shielding Shadow," Gold Rooster plays, and single reel service and expects to close Portland, Worcester, Manchester, Lowell, Portsmouth, Bangor and Augusta immediately. The advance bookings on "The Shielding Shadow" in the Boston territory are larger than on any serial ever released.

Thanhouser Directors for Pathe

In accordance with the statement made by Edwin Thanhouser, president of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, when the announcement was made of Thanhouser's release through Pathe, that he intended to produce one quarter the quantity of pictures but make them four times as good, especial attention is given to the directors of the pictures made by this company. Frederic Sullivan is Florence La Badie's director and has been with Thanhouser since 1913, which is a long record of service with one house in the motion picture business. Eugene Moore, who has been with Thanhouser since 1912, has been particularly successful in producing dramas based upon big life problems; Ernest C. Warde has had twenty-five years' stage experience, and O. A. C. Lund, the most recent recruit to the Thanhouser staff of directors, has directed many features for Metro, World and Eclair companies.

New Sherry Exchange Opens

The Wm. L. Sherry Feature Film Company offices opened September 26 at 729 Seventh avenue, New York, corner Forty-ninth street, the entire ninth floor of the new Godfrey Building.

Mr. Sherry began business March 15, 1913, in the Times Building. He opened with the Famous Players "Prisoner of Zenda" as his first and only production at that time.

The office is the largest exchange headquarters in New York City, and so far as we know in the world.

The William L. Sherry Feature Film Company handles the Paramount Program exclusively in New York State. The office staff consists of forty-one employes and Mr. Sherry at their head. For the opening the office was beautifully decorated with flowers on every desk and a huge display of flowers sent with good wishes by friends of the firm and Mr. Sherry's.

Among the more prominent persons to attend the opening were: James Steele, Mitchell Mark, Harold Edel, Hiram Abrams, Raymond Pauley, Carl Pierce, Kenneth Hodkinson and Miss Lenore Ulrich.

S. R. O. FOR "CIVILIZATION"

Success Greets the Ince War Spectacle All Over the Country Where It Is Being Distributed on the State Rights Basis

S. R. O. signs attend "Civilization" all over the country where it is being distributed on the state rights basis. The reasons for this are the unique nature and timeliness of the theme and the excellence and splendor of the production. Other big films have been made which were popular in one territory and unsuccessful in others, but "Civilization" is popular in every section, and the reason for this contrast may be summarized by the statement that the other pictures were of individual or special interest but Thomas H. Ince's spectacle is of general interest.

A misfortune befell "Civilization" in Boston. Right at the height of its showing at the Tremont Theater it was found that the house would have to be given up for another attraction. The New England Film Distributors, who were exploiting the war spectacle in this territory, were taken by surprise, as they had counted on the picture running almost indefinitely at the Tremont, where it was playing to capacity twice a day. They are looking around for new quarters, however, and expect to announce these in a short time.

Thomas H. Ince tried in every way to make "Civilization" realistic and to have all the technical details accurate. He was very much gratified to receive a call the other day from several soldiers fighting on the side of the Allies who were discharged on account of not being further fit for military duty. They had seen the production and wanted to compliment the producer on the fidelity of the trench and battle scenes in "Civilization."

"Civilization," which is approaching the fifth month of its New York presentation, and nearing its three hundredth performance, is still playing to capacity at the Park Theater, Columbus Circle, New York. The spectacle seems to be firmly placed at the Park Theater for a winter's run. In the calendar of this season's New York offerings it is nearly the oldest and by imminent effluxion will soon be at the head of the list. This great success at the Park is a tribute to the foresight of Mr. Ince, whose showmanship is something more than art, more than a vocation, and certainly more than a profession. It is an instinct. He always knows when to do the right thing at the right time in these presentations.

The Universal Film Company wishes to call the attention of the motion picture industry to the fact that Hal Reid was not an employe of that organization at the time he produced a political film for the Republican Natinonal Committee attacking the present administration. The picture was a private venture of which the Universal had no knowledge until it learned of it through the columns of the New York World.

Paramount Features Three Stars

EFFICIENCY CONTEST INAUGURATED AMONG PARAMOUNT EXCHANGES

THE big and little features on the Paramount Program for October 16 offer a variety of subjects. The big features show Fannie Ward in "Witchcraft," produced by Lasky; and Owen Moore and Marguerite Courtot in a comedy-drama, "The Kiss," produced by the Famous Players. This is Miss Warde's first production since her return to the Lasky players, and it marks the second appearance of the co-starring of Mr. Moore and Miss Courtot.

For the same week, the "little features" that Paramount will distribute are the 36th edition of the magazine-on-the-screen, the Paramount Pictographs, the 37th of the travel series of "Trips Around the World," conducted by Burton Holmes; a Paramount-Bray Cartoon, "Farmer Alfalfa Sees New York," from the pen of Paul Terry, and the second Black Diamond Comedy released by Paramount called "Bridget's Blunder."

Burton Holmes in his "Trips Around the World" this week takes the travelers to Italy visiting Naples and taking a trip across the Bay of Naples to Sorrento. Intermingled with the pictures are shown the modes and customs of the Italian people and their children, particularly those of the women whose work in Italy is especially strenuous.

Paramount Pictographs, the magazine-on-the-screen, has four exceptionally interesting pictorial articles for this week. "A Newspaper in the Making" shows every stage of the making of a newspaper from the time that the reporter is given his assignment, has written his story, gone through the editors, set in type, printed and distributed for the reading public. "Queer Jobs for the Motorcycle" shows the hundred and one ways in which the motorcycle is enabled to do things. "Checking Up the Umpire" proves that in nine out of every ten close decisions on the ball field, for which many an umpire has been "beaten up" the umpire was right. "Controlling an Oil Crusher" shows the manner in which oil is gotten from the earth.

With every feature as well as every single reel that Paramount is issuing to its exhibitors there are special mediums of exhibitors' aids also issued, thus enabling the exhibitor to put "across" his pictures in a way that is distinctly unique and decidedly up to the standard set by the Paramount Pictures Corporation.

Prizes for Exchange Efficiency

In connection with the exhibitors co-operative campaign inaugurated by Paramount Pictures Corporation two months ago an efficiency contest had now been instituted among its exchanges throughout the country for a grand prize of $2,500, the winner of which will also become the possessor of the director's silver cup, now held by the Progressive Motion Picture Company of San Francisco.

During the past two months Paramount has distributed thousands of dollars worth of aids to exhibitors through its exchanges and because of the added business and added work these have brought to the exchange managers and assistants prizes have been offered to the exchanges that show the highest efficiency in every department at the end of ninety days, beginning October 1.

In addition to the prizes offered by Paramount, there will be many thousands of dollars in prize money offered by the managers of the different exchanges providing their exchange pulls down one of the big prizes. Additional prizes will also be given each month for special events. It is estimated that the grand total of the prizes during the entire contest will approximate $10,000.

Within the Pittsburgh Exchange, which has four branch offices, a separate contest will be held, for a $1,000 prize, for the office showing the highest percentage of efficiency in its sales, exhibitors co-operating and the like, based upon similar terms as the great contest. This special prize will be distributed to the manager, the publicity director and the salesman, who are continually in direct contact with the exhibitors in their district, and who are responsible for the best co-operation an exhibitor can obtain.

A quota has been worked out for the different exchanges which they must maintain each week to secure their points entitling them to an efficient standard. To receive 100 per cent perfection, an exchange must do everything possible to aid his exhibitor through its every department.

Contest Magazine Issued

In connection with this contest there will be a weekly magazine issued at the New York office, called "Paramount Pep," edited by Charles E. Burr and the following associates: Charles E. Moyer, "Father Confessor;" William W. Hines, "Ad-Visor;" H. I. Day, "Pepper Shaker;" and C. W. Streeter, "Short Reel Booster." A weekly feature of this magazine will be the articles contributed by Philip Goodman, president of the Philip Goodman Company, advertising agents, who has taken over the trade advertising campaign for Paramount and its producers, Famous Players, Lasky, Morosco and Pallas. The magazine is printed in red and black and is illustrated with clever cartoons. It will keep the forces of the exchanges advised each week of the progress that is being made everywhere and the articles will be peppery stimulants for better work.

President Hiram Abrams will also send a weekly message to the exchanges. His first message is "that it is certainly gratifying and encouraging to see how the entire Paramount organization jumped into the traces at the first sign of the contest, and the figures on the telegrams received from the exchanges in response to our request as to what increase each exchange would make in the three months bids fair to greatly out-distance the record of efficiency hung up by Mr. Wobber, at San Francisco, last year. My best wishes to you all. May the best exchange win."

With Burton Holmes in Italy

After having made a thorough tour of Germany, England, Ireland and Scotland, in the weekly "trips-around-the-world," Burton Holmes takes the Paramount travelers to Italy, and first shows them Naples. There is always "something doing" in Naples and Mr. Holmes gets you there just in time to see the Duke of Aosta reviewing enormous military and naval parades; the tumultuous return to Naples of the pilgrims from Monte Vergine; and a trip to Sorento, noted for its Tarantella dancers.

Goldfish Resigns Chairmanship

Samuel Goldfish has resigned as chairman of the board of directors and also as a member of the executive committee of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. Mr. Goldfish, however, retains his position on the board of directors and his interests in the company, which are understood to be very large.

In response to a request for a statement regarding this decision, Mr. Goldfish said:

I have contemplated retiring from the active management of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation for some time in order to mature certain personal plans which are of great importance to me and which I could not mature if I continued as one of the executives of the company. I could not, however, see my way clear to resign as an officer of the corporation until the grave matters arising out of the adjusting of details between the two corporations which merged only recently into the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation had been completed. It is, of course, a matter of great regret to me that serving the corporation and going on with these plans of which I can say nothing definite at the present time, became inconsistent. From the time of the beginning of the Lasky Company to now, my heart and soul were in the work which I started quietly and unostentatiously only about two and one-half years ago. I am very proud of what has been accomplished first by the Lasky Company and since by the larger and more important corporation into which it merged with the Famous Players Film Company a few months ago, and proud, too, of such share of its success as my associates have been good enough to credit to my endeavors. My confidence in its future is amply evidenced, I think, by my retention of all my stock interests in it.

After receipt of Mr. Goldfish's resignation as chairman of the board of directors and a member of the executive committee of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, the board of directors issued the following statement:

Although Mr. Goldfish's resignation did not come as a complete surprise, it was received with great regret and accepted because the board felt that any request that Mr. Goldfish continue longer as an executive of the company would be unfair to him in view of his statement that his work with the company would interfere with the maturity of his personal plans. Mr. Goldfish's earnest and conscientious efforts on behalf of the Lasky Company and, since its organization, on behalf of this company, have earned for him the esteem and good will of all his associates, and in accepting his resignation, the board, collectively and as individuals, expressed to him their best wishes for and confidence in his future.

Central Film Expanding

The fourth floor of the building at 110 South State street, Chicago, is being remodeled to take care of the growing business done by the Clara Kimball Young Corporation, whose productions are handled by the Central Film Corporation of Chicago.

F. E. Whitmer has been added to the city sales force.

Harry Weiss, general manager of the Central Film Corporation, has just returned from a second automobile trip of ten days' duration. Mr. Weiss closed up contracts in Valparaiso, Indiana, South Bend, Indiana, North Manchester, Indiana, Champaign, Illinois, Springfield, Illinois, Quincy, Illinois, Bloomington, Illinois, and Peoria, Illinois. Mr. Weiss states that quite an improvement in conditions is noticeable since his last visit through this territory last July. Exhibitors are more optimistic, business is exceptionally good and there is a demand for big features.

The entire coal mining district of northern Illinois is at present tied up with infantile paralysis. Notice has been served on all theaters in Princeton, Ottowa, Peru, and La Salle, Illinois, forbidding them to allow any children in their houses, until the present epidemic is over. This caused a great deal of hardship amongst the theaters there as parents who come with children and find that children are not admitted, walk away. This condition is expected to adjust itself within the next few weeks.

"King Lear in December"

Edwin Thanhouser announces that the Frederick Warde production of "King Lear" is nearly ready and that it will be released through the Pathe exchanges, probably early in December.

Rumors that "King Lear" is not to be released through Pathe have no foundation whatever, Mr. Thanhouser asserts.

Mr. Warde, who has been on a lecture tour through New England, will return to the Thanhouser studios in a few weeks to begin work upon "The Vicar of Wakefield" which will be directed by his son, Ernest Warde.

The next feature in which Florence La Badie, the Thanhouser star, will be seen is "Divorce and the Daughter," directed by Frederic Sullivan and written by Agnes C. Johnston. It is a different sort of a story, discussing in a new way the problems of married life and the effect of divorce upon the children.

Fay Tincher In New One

At the Fine Arts Studio director Eddie Dillon has started to produce "The Lady Drummer" (temporary title), a two-reel Triangle Komedy featuring the inimitable Fay Tincher as the Lady of the Grip.

Director Dillon, aside from directing the production, also plays opposite to the Fine Arts Comedienne. Max Davidson and Kate Toncray play important parts in the production.

In "The Lady Drummer" Fay and Dillon are rival drummers but the latter gets all the orders from a cranky old spinster lady who has set her cap for him and hopes to hasten matters by showing him partiality in her business dealings. She snubs Fay. The old town sport falls in love with Fay but loses out and the two drummers finally bury their hatchets and go into a life partnership via the marriage route.

New Branch Manager

C. G. Kingsley, the present manager of the Fox Film Corporation at Cincinnati, Ohio, has been appointed the branch manager of the Famous Players Film Service, Inc., distributors of Paramount Pictures in Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan.

Mr. Kingsley, who is a well known figure in the motion picture business in the middle west assumed his new responsibilities on September 21, succeeding R. C. Schmidt, who will be the company's special traveling representative from the Pittsburgh branch. The new manager has had a wide experience in the film industry and during the past year he was in charge of the Fox interests in Detroit and Cincinnati.

There is a gold medal salesmanship contest on at the Chicago Pathe office. The contest applies to the "Who's Guilty?" series and was inaugurated by Manager Bunn to be effective during the month of September. Eight salesmen are in on the race and the winner will be dolled up with a nugget plate.

There are eighty-three extras in "Dulcie's Adventure," the second of the Mary Miles Minter pictures for the Mutual.

Jane Grey and Frank Mills in Feature

INTERNATIONAL RELEASES SECOND GOLDEN EAGLE, "THE FLOWER OF FAITH"

THE International Film Service, Inc., released its second Golden Eagle Feature, "The Flower of Faith," on October 2. This is a five-reel drama written by Charles T. and Frank Dazey. It was produced for the International by the Superb Pictures Corporation. Jane Grey is starred in the production and Frank Mills is featured. Others prominent in the cast are Percy Helton and Albert Travernier.

International's first Golden Eagle "Jaffery" bears the distinction of being the only best seller that has been reserved exclusively for the films, as no dramatic version has ever been made of this story.

Soon after "Jaffery" was written, William Randolph Hearst secured the serial rights to the story, and it was published in Harper's Bazar, duplicating the enormous success it had made in England. The Frohman Amusement Company was then given permission to screen the story for the International Film Service, Inc. There was an understanding with the author that the story should not be dramatized, Mr. Locke specifying, however, that his friend, C. Aubrey Smith, should play the title role in the photoplay.

The scenario was made by Anthony Kelly, although Mr. Locke supervised this part of the work, too. "Jaffery" is now being presented in more than 1,000 theaters throughout the country and there is every indication that it will be the "best seller" as a motion picture as it was as a book.

Exclusive motion pictures of the arrival at Bremen of the German super-submarine liner Deutschland are contained in the Hearst International News Pictorial No. 75, just released.

The latest pictures of the Deutschland were made by Nelson E. Edwards, staff photographer of the Hearst International News Pictorial in Germany. Edwards had the special permission of the German government. His pictures show the Deutschland, decorated with German flags, ascending the river to Bremen, the crowds along the banks cheering madly. The lens of his camera also caught the welcome extended to Captain Koenig, the intrepid commander of the Deutschland, and his heroic crew as they landed.

Grace Darling, the International star, says she never knew there was so much romance in the world until she began to impersonate Beatrice Fairfax on the screen. Miss Darling is receiving scores of letters and they are not all from lovelorn girls. Every mail brings epistles from business men, bankers, brokers, manufacturers and merchants, who seek advice on the subject nearest their hearts. Of course the greater part of the letters come from girls. Some of them are full of joy and many are filled with sorrow. But in every one there is a world of romance.

Olive Thomas, who is now appearing as visiting star in support of Harry Fox and Grace Darling in several episodes of the International series "Beatrice Fairfax," is becoming wedded to the screen. Miss Thomas' previous theatrical experience has been acquired in musical comedies but now she has conceived a growing ambition to become the greatest motion picture actress in the world.

In speaking of her dancing before Queen Mother Alexandra, of England, Mrs. Vernon Castle says at first she was badly frightened at the thought of appearing before royalty but she had just arrived in London after being separated from Mr. Castle for six months and was so happy gliding over the floor once more in his arms that she forgot all about who was watching her. The Queen Mother was very cordial in her congratulations and Mrs. Castle found her to be just a charming, most gracious, sweet woman.

"LITTLE MARY" A SYSTEMATIZER

Mary Pickford Planning Methods of Efficiency in Artcraft Studios to Produce Better Films and With No Wasted Time

Mary Pickford is developing into quite a director. Although she has only made one picture since she decided to be an independent star she already has found places for improvement in the efficiency and economy of her producing organization. The plan is simple and may be briefly described as a system of interlocking directors. Mary Pickford's theory is that there is an unnecessary waste while the director after the completion of a picture spends two or three weeks cutting and assembling it, then takes a short rest and time for preparation of a new scenario for production. She intends to have alternating directors. Under the new system Maurice Tourneur will direct the second Pickford release for Artcraft Pictures Corporation, while John Emerson is cutting and assembling the first, "Less Than the Dust," for release in October.

In emphasizing the practical side with its tremendous saving, Mary Pickford is keenly aware of the altruistic angle to the problem. She feels that she is now practically assured of being able to make at least six of the kind of superior productions which she is ambitious to present through Artcraft each year, and thereby Artcraft is enabled to be insured against failure to keep faith with the hundreds of exhibitors who have signed contracts for the bigger and better Pickford pictures. Many of these progressive exhibitors have revised their policy at considerable expense to book the Mary Pickford pictures released by Artcraft. They are now assured that the quality of these plays will not be variable because of the necessary haste sometimes demanded under the old system in the making of elaborate and expensive film features.

William Szarka, proprietor of a circuit of motion picture theaters in Australia, visited the offices of the Artcraft Pictures Corporation last week and reported that Mary Pickford continues to be the most popular star in the Antipodes. He was allowed to inspect the East Indian city erected on Long Island for the filming of many of the biggest scenes of "Less Than the Dust" and congratulated Miss Pickford on the remarkable fidelity of the atmosphere of the place to the real thing in India, which he has often visited. Mr. Szarka asked for the privilege of being the first Australian exhibitor to present the new superior Mary Pickford-Artcraft productions in his part of the world.

August in New Mutual

Edwin August, Ruth Bair, Iva Howard and William Bailey will appear in three charming dramas of two-reel length for the Mutual.

The first one, "The Law of Nature," in which Mr. August, the star, plays the role of a wealthy man of home-loving habits, appears on October 17. "Canned Curiosity" and "The Folly of Fear" will follow.

Mr. August himself directed these pictures in which he plays the leading role. They are produced with the characteristic August regard for detail and are delightful in every way.

Stars Still with Universal

Ella Hall has not, contrary to reports, left the Universal Company. Nor has Warren Kerrigan left the Universal fold. Reports were bruited about last week that he intended to start producing with a company of his own.

The World Two Years Old

WILLIAM BRADY ADMITS HE IS PROUD OF THE COMPANY'S ACHIEVEMENTS

ALTHOUGH no great celebration heralded the event nevertheless it remains a fact that the World Film Corporation was two years old on September 21. Everybody connected with the company was too busy to pay any attention to the birthday and for the moment it slipped by unnoticed.

Yet the arrival of such an occasion must have been in the nature of a surprise to a considerable number of persons who had viewed some portions of the infancy of this now decidedly husky and vigorous youngster. For there had been moments when the baby wobbled somewhat in its attempts to stand up. But the World kiddie was fortunate enough to outgrow this at the very beginning, so that at a point of development where most human struggles are severest, this lusty youth finds life serene and rosy and every prospect a new allurement.

"To carry out the details of the picture," said William A. Brady, director general, "I might say the World two-year-old is nourished with the very cream of exhibitors' patronage from every quarter, that the young one is soothed by the music of praise arising from great numbers of delighted associates; and that for playthings such as never have been enjoyed by any other child of whatever age or parentage, the World possesses completed releases five months in advance.

"If I may borrow one of the idioms of the newspaper headlines, the World Film is the millionaire kid.

"But there was no inheritance back of this. The possessions of the corporation were assembled by hard work along carefully drawn lines. I do not claim any special credit for what has been accomplished. Nothing could have been done without co-operation of the sort that exists in this concern. Team work is the idea.

"For months before I took hold of the task of pulling the business together I had been on the board of directors and in a position to see that the concern had reached a point where it would either go backward or forward—a situation that arises at some time or other in every commercial undertaking.

"I never had a moment's doubt as to the outcome, and neither did my associates. We all started pushing, and kept on pushing, and the ball began to roll—not much at first, but enough to show us we had budged it. That was the hardest part of it—the first move.

"Then, after the momentum had reached a satisfactory stage, came the task of control—and this also was overcome. At present we have a big machine that moves as smoothly as a Tiffany watch. It produces our pictures on the minute and distributes and advertises them without the loss of a second.

"All this is worth being proud of, but to me the biggest accomplishment of the lot is the one that is the very foundation—the recognition that World Pictures have grown better and better with every release. Yes, I certainly take pride in the achievements of the two-year-old World Film."

Forthcoming World Releases

"Without A Soul" is the title of a forthcoming World Film photoplay with Clara Kimball Young in the central role. The story, called "Lola," was written by Owen Davis, and the release will be made early in November.

In "The Honor of the Waynes," starring Robert Warwick, the male character of second importance will be played by Henry Hull, the young actor who has attracted remarkably favorable comment by his interpretation of the leading part in "The Man Who Came Back," at the Playhouse. This will be Mr. Hull's first appearance as a motion picture player. Emile Chautard is directing "The Honor of the Waynes" for the World Film Corporation.

"The Gilded Cage," new World-Brady picture with Alice Brady in the star role, recounts the stirring adventures of a young princess reared in a convent and on a moment's notice called to the throne through the assassination of her father and mother, the king and queen. Pictorially the play contrasts scenes of imperial splendor with simple country life, and there are several episodes in which great numbers of men and women participate with vivid effectiveness.

In "The Hidden Star" Holbrook Blinn and Ethel Clayton will be starred. In this play Miss Clayton takes the part of a cabaret dancer—a role very unusual for this modest star.

Sixty-Seven Exchanges for Fox

WINFIELD SHEEHAN PREPARES FOR WORLD MARKET AND FOREIGN PRODUCTION AFTER WAR

As Keats said: "Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard are sweeter." This silent selection from Fox's "Where Love Leads," with Ormi Hawley LOOKS sweet anyhow.

SIXTY-SEVEN Fox film exchanges organized in every town of any size in England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, is the record which Winfield R. Sheehan, general manager of the Fox Film Corporation, brought back with him after an extended stay abroad. With the completion of this work William Fox now has a well established organization giving his product a world market. With this market and a distribution system complete in every detail, he can go ahead building up better productions, not productions based on the individuality of some high priced star, but pictures which in every department are the best that money and brains can make them.

In speaking of his work abroad Mr. Sheehan said:

The work of establishing the Fox pictures in the British Isles has been complete in every detail. The country is covered with exchange centers as complete or possibly even more so than in this country. Every part of the distribution work will be done in England, including the supplying of all of the advertising matter used for the exploitation of the pictures. In the near future a complete developing and printing plant will be built so that we will only have to ship our negatives to the other side.

Valeska Suratt in Fox's "The Straight Way."

I hope as a result of establishing the Fox pictures in England, that in the near future it will result in a more general exchange of pictures between the two countries, a sort of reciprocity arrangement, whereby the English manufacturers will be able to show their pictures in this country with the same facility and with just as much profit as American pictures are shown over there.

There are many difficulties in the way of bringing this about, the principal one being that the English pictures have not as yet reached the American standard of quality. They have most excellent writers and actors, but have not as yet been able to utilize them to the best advantage. With so many first class American pictures now before them, however, it should not take them long to reach this stage of quality production.

If plans which are now being discussed are put into execution the Fox Company will begin producing and manufacturing in Europe as soon as war conditions will admit. Studios will be equipped in England, France and Italy.

The war has not seemed to affect the motion picture business in England to any great extent in spite of the fact that most of the men are at war. The business is booming and all the theaters are open. No new houses are being built because of the government restrictions, but the old ones are running full swing.

The main office of the Fox Film Corporation abroad is in London, and is composed of five stories and basement.

The Fox Film Corporation now has offices circling the globe. The office in Rome covers Italy, Egypt, and the Balkans; the one in Paris covers France, Switzerland, Portugal, Spain and North Africa; the one in Moscow, all of Russia; the Australian offices in Sidney, Melbourne, and Wellington, also take care of Japan, the Philippines, and the Far East, while South America is covered by offices in Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Aires, San Paula, Montevideo and Santiago, Chile.

William Russell in Indian Role

Never before has the handsome William Russell, Mutual star, been more interestingly cast, perhaps, than in the Mutual Star production, "Lone Star," which is just being started at the studios of the American Film Company, in which Mr. Russell is to play the role of an Indian. "The Indians have always offered a curious fascination to me," says Mr. Russell. "Although I was educated in New York University, far away from the haunts of the Red Man, I often spent my vacations near reservations, where I had an opportunity to study them. I am delighted with my role of 'Lone Star,' as well as with the story by Kenneth Clarke, which offers something very new and different from most of the current dramas."

McCLURE'S LUCKY SEVENS

McClure Pictures Will Show "Seven Deadly Sins" in Seven Five-Reel Features with Seven Famous Stars

The number, seven, is the mascot of the McClure Pictures. This magic number, which has proved to be the lucky number so many times in history, has been picked as the emblem of this company, and consequently everything is done by sevens. There are "Seven Deadly Sins;" seven five-reel feature plays; and seven capable stars.

Time and again "seven" takes on a peculiar significance in Hebrew and other ancient literatures, and at a comparatively modern period of theological history the "Seven Deadly Sins" were subjects of profound discussion among the church fathers.

The use of the title "Seven Deadly Sins," it is needless to say, was adopted by McClure Pictures with due reverence for its sacred connections, and the films themselves, while not in the slightest degree "preachy," nevertheless convey a strong lesson to motion-picture audiences.

They show in an intensely dramatic manner a beautiful heroine tempted by the "Seven Deadly Sins" in the guise of men and women whose lives are the personification of such evils.

Thus, while the theme itself is such as one would look for on the stage of Oberammergau or Bayreuth, the McClure conception lends itself admirably to motion picture production because of the vivid and concrete way in which the various sins are depicted, and the manner in which such stars as Ann Murdock, Nance O'Neill, Charlotte Walker, Holbrook Blinn and other players portray the characters.

Praise for Clara Kimball Young

FIRST SELZNICK PRODUCTION MEETS WITH GREAT SUCCESS AT PRE-SHOWINGS

With the presentation of Clara Kimball Young in "The Common Law," a feature received with enthusiastic praise in New York and Chicago, the new "Selznick-Pictures" at once won an important place in the film world, and arrangements are being completed for the producing and marketing of future products under the management of Lewis J. Selznick. For the business phase of the enterprise, twenty-six branches have been organized throughout the country to handle the output, while the artistic force of the new organization has turned its attention to the next feature, the Herbert Brenon production of Nazimova in "War Brides."

In New York "The Common Law" was screened simultaneously at eight of the Marcus Loew theaters. In point of attendance the picture topped the highest week-day receipts in the history of the Loew houses. Miss Young gave additional zest to the occasion by a personal whirlwind tour of the city to appear before the audience in each theater.

The story of the Chicago pre-release showing at the Studebaker theater where the picture is being given a sixteen-day run, is concisely stated in the following telegram received from Mr. Selznick from his midwestern associates, Messrs. Jones, Linick & Schaeffer, of Chicago:

"Clara Kimball Young, in 'Common Law' did biggest business in the history of Studebaker theater. Over two thousand on the two days. Everybody well pleased. All three morning papers, Tribune, Herald, Examiner, give picture wonderful criticisms. Accept our congratulations."

Plans have been perfected to make the pre-release showing of the picture at the Globe Theater in Boston another gala occasion. Miss Young will visit Boston to appear before her opening audiences and arrangements for her entertainment by civic and official society have been made.

The regular release date for the picture will be October 16, and so great has been the demand for first showings that the Selznick organization has been forced to make practically 100 prints.

Work is progressing on the first production of the Kitty Gordon Film Corporation, the latest of the producing companies organized to provide features for the Selznick Pictures. "Vera, the Medium," an adaptation of a story by Richard Harding Davis, will be the first vehicle for Miss Gordon. This subject affords the actress a splendid chance to array herself in the usual number of beautiful "Kitty Gordon gowns." The play will be produced under the supervision of G. M. Anderson, the "Broncho Billy" of Essanay fame.

"The Power of Evil"

Five-Part B. S. Moss Drama Released October 1. Reviewed by George W. Graves.

TO give the exhibitor the simple information which mostly concerns him and his patrons here at the outset, this society drama by George Bronson Howard thrills, entertains and satisfies. In its splendid dramatic structure are to be found situations of great power, depicting faithfully the operation of evil as seen on every side. Snobbishness and society butterfly-ism may be exaggerated somewhat, but this only lends to the mirrored image more power to impress. The picture's argument, which might be expressed in the truth, "the flesh profiteth nothing," is brought out in a striking manner at all times, hence its excellent moral effect. The story follows the fortunes of three people, the honors for acting being evenly distributed between Henry King, Marguerite Nichols and William West. The picture was effectively produced by H. M. and E. D. Horkheimer.

Inspired by the love of his sweetheart, a man successfully fights down an inherited desire for drink. Hardly has he married the girl, however, when she, an apt pupil of her vain mother, enters the maelstrom of fast society. Gradually her love for her husband, along with her nobler desires, burns out. One day she airily appears with her traveling bags, kisses her husband perfunctorily, and informs him that she is going to a fashionable house party—to return in three or four weeks.

During his wife's absence King houses under his roof a girl whom he has run down in his automobile and seriously injured, doing his best to bring her speedily back to health. When his wife hears of the strange woman, she hurries home at once, misinterprets (perhaps intentionally) her husband's motives and repudiates him, without giving the man any chance for explanation.

After this calamity, King's resisting power is quite broken, and he yields to his once-conquered enemy, drink. Some time later he is brought out of the depths by the girl he has befriended —now a Salvation Army worker. King becomes interested in her work and he himself becomes an ardent worker. One day his divorced wife, with a party of slummers enters the little chapel where King is preaching. Following the meeting she shows her cold indifference to him and his work, and after she has departed with the rest, King takes the worthy girl in his arms and realizes to what extent he reciprocates the feelings of his divorced wife.

"A Corner in Colleens"

Bessie Barriscale Delightful in Triangle-Ince Comedy. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"A CORNER IN COLLEENS" is a rather bright and light Irish comedy by C. Gardner Sullivan. In fact, it is an admirable little play even for the skilful Mr. Sullivan to write. In spite of some good humorous situations, it is, however, one of those scenarios that depend largely upon the star to make or unmake. Bessie Barriscale is the leading colleen of "A Corner in Colleens," and a surer way to make the story a success when it reached the screen could not be devised.

Miss Barriscale does this comedy role quite as wonderfully as she has so many highly dramatic ones. Last week's audiences at The Rialto found Miss Barriscale fascinating and amusing. She is the pretty, charming and self-reliant Irish miss who lives with her mother and several sisters on a small farm owned by a wealthy American. Taylor pays a visit to Ireland, and the land-agent expresses fears that the family may have to move out, because there is no telling what this Taylor person may decide to do with his property.

Because he is not Irish, Taylor has a hard time of it in winning the confidence of the girl. But finally he does, and for her he is perfectly willing to be Irish to the extent of being arrested as a rebel by the English soldiers. Taylor does not remain in prison long, however, for his lovely colleen sees to that.

Charles Ray is attractive as Taylor, who admits that once-upon-a-time his name might have been O'Taylor. There are many other remarkably capable players in the cast. In fact, the support given Miss Barriscale both by the actors and the particularly fine production permit her to appear to marked advantage in this comedy. "A Corner in Colleens" is light and airy, but it is an irresistibly appealing bit of film pleasantry.

"The Straight Way"

William Fox Drama Featuring Valeska Suratt. Released October 2. Reviewed by George W. Graves

"THE STRAIGHT WAY," written and directed by Will S. Davis, presents Valeska Suratt in a role in which she does a great deal of emotional acting. The story has good material in it, but there are too many incidents which "just happen," and the whole thing has been put on in a way which creates as much dizziness in one's mind as appreciation for its dramatic values. Within the space of the first fifteen hundred feet there are at least four violent accidents resulting in the death or injury of as many members of the cast, and this is not convincing. In the fifth reel there is a climax of good strength, and this, and the events immediately leading up to it, is where the real dramatic value of the picture is to be found. Here also the direction is best.

As stated above, Valeska Suratt's acting is highly emotional, and she is bound to please those who enjoy her work, as well as make new friends. But why, many spectators with a normal aesthetic sense will ask, that insufferable coiffure? It is not by any means a requirement of the part. In a large cast are Herbert Heyes, Glen White, Claire Whitney and Elsie Balfour.

Mary Madison is cast off by her husband, who unjustly suspects her relations with another man. Mary is in a railroad wreck and word comes to her husband that she is on the point of dying. Later John Madison believes that his wife is dead, and without bothering to find out for sure, he seeks out the child, Nell, and brings it to his home to rear. Mary recovers from the accident, that is, physically. Mentally, she is oblivious to the past.

Fourteen years later Mary's recollection is restored.

"The Straight Way."

Madison has married again. Learning that his daughter is his pride, and believing it to be the child of his second wife, Mary plans to ruin the girl to punish her father. Later, to her horror, Mary learns that the girl is her own, her plot of revenge adjusts itself with harm to no one, and a reunion of the little family takes place.

"The Straight Way," while not among the best Fox offerings, will very likely go well with a large class, because in it are things that the public has devoured with avidity in time past.

"The Dark Silence"

Clara Kimball Young in Five-Reel World Play. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris.

THE present European War forms a dramatic background for this Peerless production released by World. The story however deals only indirectly with things military, and concerns itself mostly with a tragic misunderstanding between a young American art student and the man to whom she is engaged. Clara Kimball Young as the artist, Mildred, heads a cast of uniform excellence. The play is well acted and photographed, and the sets are good. Albert Capellani is responsible for the direction of the picture, from a story by Paul West.

While the acting and the technicalities of the offering are satisfying and the drama entertains, a number of improbabilities in the plot itself bring the whole down to only average merit. There are too many coincidences in the story. Too often we feel that one word of explanation from one character or other would have dissolved the trouble (and incidentally the story). But the explanation is not given and the players wander blindly on, doing things which frequently seem motiveless. All ends well, however; in fact, the ending is the best part of the play. There is a relieving touch of heroism on the part of the villain of the story which provides a pleasant after-taste.

Beside Miss Young, the cast contains Edward T. Langford as Derwent Ainsworth, the hero, a young English sculptor, and Paul Capellani as Martinex, the villain, a surgeon. Barbara Gilroy and Jessie Lewis have important roles also.

The Story: Mildred, studying painting in Paris, meets Ainsworth, an English sculptor. The two fall in love and are engaged to be married. Then the sculptor is called home to England by the death of his father. Although the father has been seriously ill since the beginning of the story, Ainsworth seems never to have mentioned the fact to the girl he was to marry, or to have disclosed the fact that he had a sister, Sybil, so dear to him that her framed portrait held the place of honor on his desk. Therefore, when he leaves for England, after giving an explanatory letter to Martinez to be delivered to Mildred, Martinez, in love with Mildred, has little trouble inducing the girl to believe that Ainsworth has returned to a former sweetheart named Sybil. After that, luck aids him in intercepting letters from England until Mildred, her love for Ainsworth killed, consents to elope with the surgeon.

Ainsworth returns to Paris in time to check Martinez's plan of elopement, but, believing Mildred false to him, he joins the army. Mildred becomes a Red Cross nurse under an assumed name, and when Ainsworth is wounded the two meet. Ainsworth is blind and does not recognize Mildred. Later he marries her, still ignorant of her real identity.

Sometime later, in England, Martinez meets Ainsworth's sister, who begs him to use his skill in surgery in an effort to restore her brother's sight. Martinez agrees, and there is a dramatic situation when the surgeon meets Mildred. Mildred fears that, should her husband recover his sight, he will cast her off because of her deception. Nevertheless, she hopes for the recovery. The operation is a success, but the surgeon, repentant, has told the true story to Ainsworth and Mildred's fears are not realized. We leave Ainsworth and Mildred happy in a final understanding. The reformed villain, while aiding the wounded soldiers, is killed, a martyr.

"The Crisis"

Selig's Production of Remarkable Novel Has Many Merits. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE film adaptation of Winston Churchill's "The Crisis," which was produced by Selig under the direction of Colin Campbell, lures the describer into the dangerous channels of superlatives. In all truth and honesty, "The Crisis" is a great photoplay production. Small wonder that the author expressed himself as delighted with the visualization of his most successful novel. The book will naturally stimulate interest in the picture, but we feel that it will not be disproportionate to the numbers who will read the book after seeing the picture.

Colin Campbell has been producing pictures for a number of years and during the time he has brought forth some excellent ones but it remains for "The Crisis" to attract the attention to him which he so richly deserves. In the picturization of this novel he has accomplished really wonderful things. It is easy enough to sit back and say that the director had a mighty good story to work on, but as a matter of fact there are many others that would seem to offer the producer far fewer difficulties. He has remained faithful to his story and at the same time faithful to his own art. The result of this is a picture which carries the charm of the novelist's work expressed differently. It is a case of words made, not changed, into action.

The most remarkable thing is that Mr. Campbell was able to make it a ten-reel production with all the power and grip a confirmed picturegoer could desire without sacrificing everything to the spectacular. There are some very impressive spectacular battle scenes but they are not used as a support to the main action of the play. They could be left out of the reckoning and still "The Crisis" would be a great picture. These scenes all will be glad to see. They are big and they thrill, which is the very reason for their presence here. Moreover they do add to the story which tells of the Civil War and the magnificent heroism of those Americans it affected.

The "thriller," which shows a horse and rider fall down a steep cliff, finds the fondest hopes for its startling effect upon the spectator fully realized. But we are not prepared to say that it thrills more than the simple picture of Abraham

One of the many powerful human scenes in the big Selig production "The Crisis."

Lincoln standing before a window and after receiving word that he has been elected to the presidency lifting his eyes and hands in an appeal for guidance in discharging the great responsibility he will soon assume. Other stirring instances can be pointed out; there are many, among them being the Lincoln-Douglas debate. Every American will thrill at these realistic scenes which the director led up to so effectively and which quicken the action of any heart that realizes what that debate really meant to future of this nation.

"The Crisis" tells of that period in the history of the United States when the question of slavery threatened to destroy the Union. The characters in the play depict the utter hopelessness of any settlement other than that resorted to. They are charmingly and humanly drawn characters and the interpretations given by the members of this cast are equally admirable. The story is filled with moments of deep pathos. These characters are at once so real and lovable that we would be inclined to judge that person who is not moved by them a cold and abnormally unsympathetic individual.

Bessie Eyton is a lovely Virginia, Thomas Santschi a convincing and in every way admirable Stephen Brice and Marshall Neilan makes Clarence Colfax a most attractive character. George W. Fawcett, as Judge Silas Wright, gives a performance that is a credit to one of many accomplishments in a long career on the stage and several successful appearances on the screen. Eugenia Besserer and Matt B. Snyder are also excellent. Sam D. Drane, Frank Wood, Will Nachin, Cecil Holland and all the other members of the cast deserve the highest praise. It is a cast of uniform excellence that enacts "The Crisis."

This production is one that will advertise itself. It is bound to become a sensational success, or so it seems to us. "The Crisis" deserves success if ever a motion picture production did. The story holds one interested, the production is technically splendid, the photography all that it should be and the direction is the work of an artist.

"Lost Twenty-four Hours"

Essanay Comedy in Three Acts, Released October 14. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A CLEVER cast of players interpret this comedy drama which, without being too farcical, contains many situations which will amuse any audience. Richard Travers, Marguerite Clayton, Harry Dunkinson, Warda Howard, Gertrude Glover and John Junior form the very well balanced cast and the work of each is noteworthy. The photography and settings are good, and the picture as a whole will entertain. The theme has possibilities not especially well brought out. There is a lack of effectiveness in presenting the story, but the result is nevertheless pleasing, although one has the feeling that with a cleverer, brisker treatment, it could have been made more humorous.

The Story: Dick Swift (Richard Travers), in the absence of his wife, Milly (Marguerite Clayton), sets out to have a good time with his friend, Adolphus Smiley (Harry Dunkinson). The complications which result from this good time furnish the theme of the play. For the two friends fall in with a dishonest dealer in automobiles and his partner, Mrs. Dacre (Warda Howard). Dick, who becomes intoxicated, drives Mrs. Dacre's car. Through a trick, the schemers substitute an old car for that of Mrs. Dacre, wreck it and hold Dick responsible.

Dick goes home and sleeps twenty-four hours, completely forgetting the events of the night before. He is bewildered when he is later confronted by a bill for damages to the car. He is also filled with alarm when his wife returns and finds Mrs. Dacre at their home. He presents her as a long lost sister, and the woman, taking advantage of the situation, accepts Milly's invitation to make her home with them, to the consternation of Dick and his brother.

But everything is settled when the damaged car is recognized as one sold previously by Milly and really valueless. And Mrs. Dacre and her partner are arrested as blackmailers.

THE Frohman Amusement Corporation follows up its successful production of "Jaffery" with a film adaptation of Booth Tarkington's "The Conquest of Canaan," that is in the truest sense of the word excellent. "The Conquest of Canaan" may honestly be recommended as one of the most artistic screen plays ever offered to the exhibitor. On the other hand, it will be found an immeasurable delight by screen patrons, both discriminating and otherwise, though those of the former classification are in a better position to appreciate its true worth.

That this charming story of a boy's triumphant battle with hostile influences could be brought to the screen with all the human appeal characteristic of Booth Tarkington's creations is indeed a credit to Director George Irving and Anthony Kelly, who scenarioized the novel. Between Mr. Irving and Mr. Kelly there is little to choose when it comes to apportioning credit for the achievement. Evidently these two worked in harmony. For there is no other way to account for the striking display of real art and keen intelligence found in the visualization of "The Conquest of Canaan." Talent and skill of a rare quality made "The Conquest of Canaan" the wonderful picture it is.

The offering is far superior to the average good production and all for the simple reason that it is human. Its characters are life-like, they are normal beings. "The Conquest of Canaan" is a charming story, as the countless numbers who have read the novel will agree. But to bring this story to the screen was an ambitious attempt, for it seems to us a story that could easily be made into one of the poorest of pictures. It is only natural, therefore, for one to pay the highest compliments to George Irving.

Jack Sherrill appears as Joe Louden, the youth, who, like numbers of others, is for some unaccountable reason made the object of all the unkindness all the so-called "better" people of a small town must unburden themselves of. Joe, a conscientious, ambitious and big-hearted boy finally decides to leave Canaan. He travels about and earns his living as best he can, all the while studying law faithfully. He returns to Canaan an accredited member of the legal profession but his only clients are the habitues of Beaver Beach, a dancing and drinking resort. Joe takes to drink and he is on the downward path when his loyal friend, Ariel Tabor, returns from Paris. Ariel encourages him and after many adventures Joe wins over the entire town.

Mr. Sherrill puts so much sincerity into his work and the part given him is so sympathetic that there can be only praise for the player. It is sincerity more than skill—something that will come to Sherrill when he has had the experience necessary—that enables him to make so favorable an impression. Edith Taliaferro as Ariel brings to light the fact that producers of pictures are not doing their best by picturegoers when they fail to engage her for as many productions as possible. In this offering she has a very important but not large part. Her scenes are not many but they are of a high order of quality and effectiveness. Yes, Edith Taliaferro should be seen often in pictures!

The other parts are rendered in good style by Walter Hiers, Jack Hopkins, Marie Edith Wells, Ben Hendricks, Ralph Delmore, Gene La Motte and Thomas Ward. The settings are splendid and the atmosphere of the small town has been most cleverly and effectually suggested by the director. Photography is the other important factor which deserves commendation. "The Conquest of Canaan" pleases mightily.

"The Firm of Girdlestone"

Five-Part Vitagraph Feature Released October 9 on V-L-S-E. Reviewed by G. W. Graves

SIR Arthur Conan Doyle's story as translated into the language of the screen by Bannister Merwin will entertain the spectator and keep his interest, although its action is none too exhilerating and its dramatic form sometimes gives place to the narrative. Interpreting the piece we have a cast of which all the members are competent. Edna Flugrath has the largest apportionment of dramatic scenes and she turns most of these to very good effect. The two heavies who ruthlessly pursue her are Fred Groves and Charles Rock. The spectator becomes quite imbued with the disagreeableness of their parts and quite worked up over their arch-villainy, which reflects credit on their acting as well as on the author's conception. And as for the hero, there is none—that is, there is no active hero. The girl is saved solely by her own intuition and her enemies are consumed in the heat of their own wickedness. There was a young man present who might have been a hero, but his part does not ascend above just being a lover. This negative male role is taken by Hayford Hobbs.

Harold Shaw, who directed, has worked for realism and "class," and has not fallen short of his ambitions. Bits of the city of London used from time to time as settings, serve excellently to accentuate the English atmosphere which pervades the story. Sir A. Conan Doyle's spirit is well maintained. The picture will easily find favor with the majority of people.

The main plot of the story has to do with the diabolical persecutions of a girl by her sordid guardian, whose will it is that she marry his son. This will bring a large piece of money to the tottering "firm of Girdlestone," of which he is the head. Kate's persistent refusal to succumb to his mesmerism (for it is all of that), and his own realization that her death will be the solution of his troubles, leads him to resort to subtle and uncanny methods to gradually undermine her health and mental resistance. She is held in captivity in Girdlestone's country house and is led to believe that her lover has forsaken her; a lie and scheme invented by the wicked father and son to further their purposes.

Finally old Girdlestone, realizing the inefficacy of his methods, tries other tactics. He has his son, Ezra, write a note to her, saying that in spite of what has happened, he (Ezra) is her friend, and will help her to escape if she will meet him at a certain place that night. Kate senses the true purpose of this and does not venture out. Her jealous maid, however, secretly reads the note, misinterprets it, makes up as Kate and goes in her place. Thus the poor maid goes to the slaughter. Soon after the killing, aid arrives, due to a call for help Kate previously managed to send out. When the murderers have dragged the body to the railroad track they are there confronted by Kate, followed closely by a rescue party. At the sight of what they think is an apparition the murderers flee in terror and meet their death over the brink of a cliff.

Selig Releases of the Week

"Converging" Paths" and "A Mistake in Rustlers" for October 9. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THE Selig drama released on the General program of the current week is a re-issue, a two-reeler, "Converging Paths," written by Hettie Grey Baker and directed by Burton L. King. Robyn Adair and Virginia Kirtley have the leading roles, with Eugenie Forde and Leo Pierson in important parts. The theme, very simple and treated simply, is of the "up-lift" type, the conversion of a young criminal who chances into a rescue mission while escaping from the police. The element of probability never enters the story for a minute, but very uncritical audiences may follow the events with the interest which attach to a clearly presented narrative.

The "converging paths" mentioned are those of Nell, a country girl adrift in a great city, and Dan, a product of the city slums. Nell has lost her position and is friendless and penniless. Dan is wanted by the police, when the two by chance meet in the mission. The minister and his wife give them aid and good advice which changes their lives. Dan decides to be honest and later he and the girl are married.

"A Mistake in Rustlers" is a one-reel western drama released in the same week. It was written and produced by Tom Mix and is a pleasing offering of the type which has grown popular. The photography is good, the horses spirited and their riders clever. The action is brisk, and the picture is full of the vivid outdoor life in which lies the eternal fascination of the film "western."

The Story.—Vicky (Vicky Forde) has consented her betrothed, Tom, with a silk kerchief. One of the men on the ranch, who engages in cattle "rustling," steals the kerchief and with it binds one of the calves he has stolen. Suspicion of the theft is therefore directed against Tom, but Vicky plays detective and discovers the guilty one.

"Philip Holden—Waster"

Richard Bennett in Mutual Star Production. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris.

THE first scenes of this picture, introducing Richard Bennett in the character of the whimsical Philip Holden seem to greet the viewer with a promise. "This picture is going to be great," and then the production goes about keeping its promise very well. A more entertaining, delightful, wholesome comedy is seldom seen. It is also a very interesting story told briskly and clearly. Its production is satisfactory in every way. Kenneth B. Clarke, the author, has provided Bennett with a subject in which he has an opportunity to draw an original and wholly pleasing character, and the star has taken full advantage of every situation. The direction by George Sargent is good.

The thoroughly delightful work of the star is aided by the excellent supporting cast, which includes George Fawcett as Philip's elder and very practical brother, Adrienne Morrison who plays with distinction the role of the brother's wife, Rita Mitchell as the girl with whom Philip falls in love, and Clarence Burton as the girl's father. Orral Humphrey has an effective part, also, as Philip's dishonest employer.

One could go into detail regarding many scenes in the play humorous and dramatic, but it will be perhaps sufficient to say that it is a film no exhibitor need fear to show and advertise, whether his patrons are the good natured, unsophisticated class which likes an interesting story with plenty of laughs or a high brow group which is delighted by the subtle humor and extreme character portrayal.

The Story.—Philip Holden, dreamy, impractical but very likeable, spends his time writing poetry and living some of which he sells. He lives at the home of his elder brother, a prosperous financier. At a reception given by his brother's wife, he meets Louise Holden and falls in love with her. Thereupon complications begin, for Philip decides to win a fortune in order to marry Louise. He has a hard time at first even winning a job, but at last he is appointed a salesman of mining shares, taking his commission in the mining stock. The mine is believed worthless by its backers, but Philip, who is innocent of any dishonest motives, is able, through his engaging personality, to sell an enormous amount of the stock.

Then the mine becomes productive, and Philip, who occasionally is shrewd, is able to enforce his claim and that of his clients to a share of the riches. He uses his money to play the stock market, interferes with his brother's schemes in this field, multiplies his fortune and endangers that of his brother, and creates in general a large amount of excitement before he places his fortune in charge of his brother and gives his attention to playing troubadour to Louise.

"The Old Folks at Home"

Triangle-Fine Arts Production of Rupert Hughes' Novel. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE Fine Arts picturization of Rupert Hughes' novel "The Old Folks at Home," features Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree. Mr. Tree's presence in the production of course gives it added importance as a box-office attraction. Also, it may be said that the celebrated English actor contributes a goodly share toward the appeal of "The Old Folks at Home." His performance as John Coburn, a Yankee farmer whose intelligence and knowledge of State politics takes him to the State Senate, is wholly admirable. Mr. Tree lays aside the poise and gesture of a costumed romantic character and acts the part of a rural American with grace and dignified effectiveness.

"The Old Folks at Home" contains no little charm. It is an old story, this one of the young country boy who visits the city and plays the city's game of life with disaster as the profit. But it is productive of pathos and a quaint sort of humor that seldom fails to bring response. Parental devotion can be beautiful and then again it can become mere sticky sentimentality. In the case of "The Old Folks at Home" there is much warming beauty to the mother's and the father's love for the prodigal but the director did not permit it to become sticky, as such things go. It is left to the mother to make a pathetic appeal to the jury sitting in judgment upon her son, who is being tried for murder. As a consequence the jury disregards more or less the evidence and acquits the defendant, so there is a happy conclusion to the story. This is as it should be. It is the last pleasant touch to an evening of really enjoyable entertainment.

Chester Withey wrote the scenario and directed the production. Mr. Withey acquitted himself splendidly in his dual role. The story runs smoothly and the production lends an air of genuineness to the pretty tale. It was not essential to use five reels of film to unfold this play.

"The Old Folks at Home" could be done in less than that. But as long as filling was necessary it is well that Mr. Withey supplied the want with attractive material. As the picture is we doubt that anyone will express the desire that it were shorter.

Josephine Crowell has some good opportunities and she makes excellent use of them. Elmer Clifton gives a performance of merit and Mildred Harris is pretty and engaging as the country girl who remains faithful to her contrite sweetheart. Lucille Younge, W. E. Lawrence and Spottiswoode Aitken complete the cast.

"Beatrice Fairfax"

Episodes 8 and 9 of International's Beatrice Fairfax. Reviewed by George W. Graves

BOTH of these episodes must be numbered among the liveliest and most interesting of these natty little Beatrice Fairfax stories. In episode eight, entitled "At the Ainsley Ball," Miss Fairfax receives a letter from a young man who asks, "Is there any way an honest man can prevent his girl from falling in love with a fascinating foreigner?" Of course the picture does not try to point out how any young man thus embarrassed may set about solving his problem, but the situation gives Jimmy and his companion, Beatrice, a chance to do a little sleuthing and to catch the thieving fortune-hunter in a nicely prepared trap. At a bal masque Beatrice attends in the same costume as Martha, the woman in the case, is wearing. Thus she is mistaken for Martha by the foreigner, who actually kidnaps her and whirls her off in his automobile. Jimmy convinces Martha of her foreign suitor's duplicity and the two pursue. After a prolonged chase the fleeing automobile is overtaken, and Beatrice saved. The count, who has incidentally appropriated all of his sweetheart's jewels, is turned over to the police, and Martha solemnly promises never to flirt more.

In the ninth episode, "Outside the Law," the two young newspaper comrades save Madeline Grey, a young married woman, from the hands of an unscrupulous individual, the publisher of a weekly paper devoted to scandal. He blackmails Mrs. Grey for an enormous sum on the threat that he will publish some foolish and compromising letters she wrote to another man, before her marriage. The method which Beatrice and Jimmie adopt to force the old scandal-monger to relinquish the letters, makes an interesting tale.

Some comedy touches are found in "Outside the Law" through the medium of Harry Fox's bright personality. Grace Darling, as Beatrice Fairfax, never fails to charm completely. Mae Hopkins' performance in both pictures is commendable.

"The Wheel of the Law"

Five-Reel Rolfe-Metro Drama Released September 18. Reviewed by George W. Graves

HERE is another play which takes as its theme the injustice of circumstantial evidence. However, its quality, its excellent production and intense situations set it high above the majority of the pictures which bring in the discussion of this subject. George D. Baker has directed the picture in a highly effective and artistic manner, in fact, his painstaking, skilled methods have placed it among the finest directed pieces yet appearing on the Metro program. Especially worthy of laud is a scene taken from "La Tosca," reproduced on the screen with wonderful accuracy and effect.

The standard of acting in "The Wheel of the Law," is also very high. Emily Stevens gives an altogether appealing polished rendition of the part of the woman whose cleverness and daring are sufficient to prove to her ambition-maddened husband that he is in the wrong. Supporting Miss Stevens is a large cast, including Frank Mills, Raymond McKee, Edwin Holt and Roma Raymond. The story was written by Katherine Kavanaugh.

Norton, whose amazing ability to convict solely on circumstantial evidence is far-famed, succeeds to the office of district attorney when the latter falls ill. His brilliance wins for him many a case and sends many innocent men to the chair—a fact which he realizes fully, but one which does not deter him from the path which his ambition has marked out. If it is his business to prove guilty and his opponents are not clever enough to disprove his intricate webs of circumstantial evidence, wherein has he failed of his duty?

Finally Tommy, Norton's brother-in-law, becomes involved in a murder. Ryan, the political boss, is the murderer. He promises Norton that if he convicts the boy he will make him governor of the state. For reasons pointed out, Norton does not know Tommy is his brother-in-law, and when his wife tells him the truth, it has little effect on his determination. Finally, in a desperate state, the wife hits upon a scheme whereby she can bring home to him forcefully the fact of the wickedness of his course. She arranges evidence which will condemn Norton and then pretends to be dying from poison administered secretly by him. When the law has laid its hands on him and he is passionately imploring his wife to live, promising to save Tommy, she suddenly comes to life, and explains to Norton and the others the significance of her ruse. Ryan later makes a death-bed confession which easily releases Tommy.

"The Battle of the Somme"

British War Pictures Offered by Patriot Film Corporation. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IN view of the several war films this country has already been presented with it is only natural to suppose that by this time a film giving pictures of military operations in Europe must have something really to show if it expects a favorable reception from the public over here. "The Battle of the Somme" is more like a war picture than any of the others we have seen. It is, in fact, the best film to come from Europe in that it gives pictures of actual fighting.

Some of the other pictures in which nothing but marching men and an occasional picture of a big gun being fired made us wish to see some real fighting on the screen. In "The Battle of the Somme" we saw the fighting and the men being killed, others carried in desperately wounded and all the other hideous activity that goes with war and we wonder at ourselves for ever desiring to see more of war than we did in the past. The pictures are well worth seeing and it is to be hoped that they will be viewed by every person in the country. This, because they preach the most powerful sermon against war that, perhaps, the screen has ever held.

The pictures were taken by the British Government and were brought over here by Charles Urban, who is representing the government in distributing the film in this country. They are the first pictures of a battle at what might be called close range. There have been many pictures of battles but the party of the second part to the engagement was so far away that there was no "thrill' because the camera man could catch pictures of shots being fired only. Here the camera was able to register on the film some of the shots received, and while it is not pleasant, in fact, wholly terrible, to see men wilt to the ground never to rise again, this very thing makes one say that "The Battle of the Somme" is the best war film so far offered.

These pictures almost make one feel that Henry Ford is right. Of course, he is not. But war sends up such fumes of terror and horror that one can see ahead to the victory to be gained only at the expense of a prodigious effort to discern the paramount issue. Blood being spilt in such quantities is enough to take any mind off on a tangent.

"The Battle of the Somme" is in four reels. The photography is particularly good and the film well assembled. We have already said that we think it the best film of its kind we have seen, so there is no reason for further description of the picture here.

"Somewhere in France"

Triangle-Ince War Drama Adapted from R. H. Davis' Story. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A DRAMA of interesting and satisfying phases is offered in this screen adaptation of "Somewhere in France," by the late Richard Harding Davis. "Somewhere in France" deals with the present war and it is not as unneutral as might be expected, for the romance of intrigue and the characters center all the interest in the action and whether the hero be French and the villainous German is of second consideration. The fact that the war concerned is still grimly flourishing has no remarkable effect on the spectator.

Louise Glaum as Marie Chaumontel appears in gowns that are as interesting as those she usually affects and, too, Miss Glaum excites attention in the viewer for the character. Marie sympathizes with Germany. In the opening scenes she is professing love for a French officer, but at the first opportunity she steals some prodigiously important documents and sells them to agents of Germany.

The young officer is tried before a military court and is sentenced to imprisonment for neglect. But Captain Ravignac does what all of his class believes the more honorable—he commits suicide. The captain's brother then resolves to clear the family name by revealing Marie as the cunning, deceitful creature she is. There is a lapse of time and we next see Marie living in a cottage within the German lines. Still there is a man in the case. A wireless operator transmits and receives important messages for her. He is introduced as a soldier of fortune, an Italian, and he always wears an eyeshade, even while speaking to Marie.

The woman receives orders to move closer to Paris. She remains with the Italian and her aunt in a chateau captured by the Germans, who are now retreating. Though she shows great resource and nerve, Marie and her schemes are discovered by the French general, and after her departure for the prison the supposed Italian reveals himself to the general as Lieutenant Charles Ravignac, brother of the captain who suffered disgrace at the hands of Marie.

Howard Hickman is commendable as Charles Ravignac and Jerome Storm does remarkably well as the unfortunate captain. Joseph J. Dowling, Fanny Midgley, George Fisher and Carl Ullman are also in the cast. Charles Giblyn produced the picture.

NO WAR IN "WAR BRIDES"

Herbert Brenon Has Unique Idea of Creating War Atmosphere Without Fighting Scenes in Trenches in Play Featuring Nazimova

Those who are looking for spectacular battlefield scenes with death and destruction vividly portrayed in Herbert Brenon's production of "War Brides" in which Nazimova will make her first appearance, are doomed to disappointment. To present all the vital elements of the great drama of war without a shot being fired, is the unique idea which Herbert Brenon has evolved for his production of Marion Craig Wentworth's play.

This is not because Brenon is afraid of battles, for in "A Daughter of the Gods" he staged scenes of warfare in which several thousand fighting men participated on each side. He decided to avoid the depiction of actual combat in "War Brides," because he believes that too many spectacular episodes detract from the story, and in this photodrama the personal interest is so intense that he does not intend to permit anything to detract from it.

"We are just beginning to realize," says Mr. Brenon, "that the greatest dramas of warfare are not those of the trenches. There, all is confusion, chaos. The drama must always be personal, and in the clashes of armies, the individual is lost. Therefore, while maintaining the atmosphere of wartime as a background, I shall try to show what war means, through its effect upon the lives of simple people, their sufferings, their blasted hopes, their shattered romances. The world has read a great deal about the war brides idea as it was developed in European countries at the outset of the present war, and I shall try to make the tragedy of that idea clear to everyone."

Only a few more scenes of this picture remain to be made, and early in November there will be a New York showing of the work. The photodrama will be released through Lewis J. Selznick. Mr. Brenon is now closing negotiations for his next picture, which will be taken from a novel by one of America's greatest living authors.

VIVIAN MARTIN IN NEW ONE

Popular Star to Be Seen in Next Oliver Morosco Subject on Paramount Program, Released October 12

As its next release on the Paramount Program, the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company will present Vivian Martin in "Her Father's Son," by Anna Fielder Brand, and staged under the direction of William D. Taylor.

"Her Father's Son" is the second Paramount release starring this winsome little favorite and offers a drama of heart interest together with quaint situations dealing with the period in the South just prior to the Civil War. In this production Miss Martin disguises herself as a boy and as a result encounters many difficulties which are straightened out only when the climax of the play is reached.

In addition to Director Taylor's usual delicate touches, Miss Martin's new vehicle displays various spectacular scenes of unusual realism, including a series of immense battle scenes. One of the largest interior sets ever erected at the Morosco studios is also shown, representing a massive ball-room with a high balcony and grand stairway. It is expected that this and other sets presented in "Her Father's Son" will establish a new record for elaborate beauty and excellence, even exceeding anything that Morosco has yet offered in this regard.

The supporting cast discloses another typical Morosco company and includes such sterling players as Herbert Standing, Alfred Vosburgh, Helen Jerome Eddy, Joe Massey, Jack Lawton, Lucille Ward, and Tom Bates, the last mentioned portraying one of the most remarkable negro characters ever seen upon the screen. Homer Scott supervised the camera work.

Special advertising boosters have been prepared for this production and big returns are expected by exhibitors throughout the country, particularly in the many cities in which "Vivian Martin Cooking Chatter" series is being published by local newspapers. Miss Martin's articles have won her many new friends who will be anxious to see her in her next photoplay, which will be released through the Paramount commencing October 12th.

The boy here is a girl—and not just a girl either, for it's Vivian Martin in her newest play, "Her Father's Son."

ABOUT BUDDING PLAYS, AND NEWS OF THE TRADE

Mabel Taliaferro as Sunshine Girl

Metro-Rolfe Release "The Sunbeam" in Which Mabel Taliaferro and Gerald Griffin Are Starred—Metro Popular in Canada.

METRO-ROLFE'S next five-part wonderplay will be "The Sunbeam" in which Mabel Taliaferro plays the part of the girl who brings sunshine into the lives of all with whom she comes in contact. Edwin Carewe, who has directed all Miss Taliaferro's photoplays at the Rolfe studio, will again be her director in this picture.

With the introduction of Metro features in three of the leading theaters in British Columbia, under most auspicious circumstances, the connecting link of Metro theaters in Canada from coast to coast, has been consummated. Herbert Lubin, who has charge of Metro plays in Canada, reports Metro's offering of Mme. Petrova in "My Madonna" brought out such crowds that hundreds were turned away and traffic was blockaded for several hours in front of the theater. At Vancouver in spite of a heavy downpour of rain and strong counter attractions, on the opening night of Metro's offering of Mme. Petrova, these did not detract from the opening. In Nanaimo, Metro's first offering was Edmund Breese in "The Shooting of Dan McGrew," and it played to capacity business despite the fact that the counter attraction was a big carnival. In Victoria the Metro program was presented for the first time and hundreds were turned away.

Gerald Griffin, known as "the globe-trotting actor," has been engaged to play opposite Mabel Taliaferro in the Metro-Rolfe production of "The Sunbeam." Mr. Griffin has played in stock in all parts of the world. His motion picture experience includes the leading role in "Feathertop," a Gaumont production, and "Blood Will Tell" for the Serial Film Company.

Julius Stern, president and general manager of the L-Ko Comedy Company has returned from his vacation in the White Mountains. He will spend a few weeks in New York preparatory to his return to the coast studios. Louis Jacobs, business manager of the L-Ko company, arrived in New York bringing with him details of the activities at the studios, where Francis Ford and Grace Cunard are working on something new.

Alice Howell, Dan Russell, William Irving, Phil Dunham and all the other popular comedians and comediennes are also on the job.

Thompson Resigns

Wallace Thompson has resigned as director of publications and advertising of the Paramount Pictures Corporation and left the Paramount office last week. He was brought to Paramount by W. W. Hodkinson last April, when the latter was president of the company, and was placed in executive charge of publicity, advertising, house organs, and Pictographs. He left the managing editorship of the Popular Science Monthly to join Paramount. Previous to his connection with the monthly, Mr. Thompson was managing editor of Town and Country, and before that was in magazine and newspaper work in the West, Mexico, and France.

Mr. Thompson handled the recent convention of exchange managers and publicity men for Paramount in Chicago last July, and planned and put under way the Paramount scheme of a publicity manager in each exchange which was the backbone of the Paramount drive of co-operative publicity and trade advertising.

Mr. Thompson will remain in the motion picture business, but does not care to discuss his plans at the present time.

Ochs Books "Yellow Menace"

The Unity Sales Corporation believes it is scoring a record number of bookings on its sixteen episode serial "The Yellow Menace," which is now being released to exhibitors throughout the United States. One of the most important contracts which has been closed, books "The Yellow Menace" for the six theaters owned and controlled by Lee A. Ochs, National president Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America.

When asked to express his opinion in regard to the value of serials for a program, Mr. Ochs said: "For the coming season I have booked serials for all my theaters, because to my mind serials are the best two-reel propositions that the market offers. Generally speaking, more money is spent on serial productions and the tremendous publicity behind them is of inestimable value to the theaters. Another factor of utmost importance that must not be overlooked, is the fact that when patrons become interested in a serial, it means continued patronage from fourteen to sixteen weeks as the case may be, and furthermore by bringing the patrons to a theater, an exhibitor, through the medium of the screen, has the opportunity to keep them posted as to the excellence of his other attractions.

"In regard to how 'The Yellow Menace' appeals to me, my best answer is—I have booked this tremendous soul-stirring serial for all my theaters. This is the best evidence in the world that I consider it an A1 drawing card."

The Bartola Company has just sold the fourth Bartola to be installed in Omaha theaters in the past two months.

Arthur MacHugh has been re-appointed as publicity manager for the B. S. Moss enterprises.

Roy Fernandez, winner of the Universal "handsomest man contest," has been occupied since his arrival in New York in serving as model for Harrison Fisher in a series of magazine covers made by the latter.

Murdock MacQuarrie is in New York as the representative of the Directors' Association of Los Angeles.

Pauline Frederick has returned to town after a brief vacation at Mountain Lakes, stolen between the completion of "Ashes of Embers" and the beginning of her next Famous Players-Paramount picture.

Louise Huff, who will co-star with Jack Pickford in the Famous Players version of Booth Tarkington's novel, "Seventeen," will play Lola, the flirtful, baby-talk lady, and not Jane, the champion all-around apple-sauce-and-sugar-and-bread consumer.

Ann Pennington has departed from New York with the Ziegfeld "Follies," which have gone on tour.

Portland Headlight, a lighthouse off Fort William, Maine, was reproduced within doors in the Metro-Rolfe studio for Mabel Taliaferro's next five act play, "The Dawn of Love." The original lighthouse was used for most of the scenes of the photoplay, but the government would not permit the actual switching on and off of the light necessary for the action of the play, and so Metro was compelled to reproduce the lighthouse in its entirety for the sake of a few scenes. Edward J. Shulter, technical director, made the plans, and the lighthouse was built, the exact size of Portland Headlight, by Patrick J. Carey with five assistants.

W. T. Carleton, the operatic baritone, having completed a seven months' engagement with George Kleine, playing Pierpoint Stafford, father to Gloria Stafford (Billie Burke), in the photoplay, "Gloria's Romance," has been engaged for a period of twenty weeks by the Astra Film Corporation to appear as Colonel Dare, U. Miss Frederick believes that the rest is doubly earned as she played a dual role in this Paramount Picture.

PACIFIC COAST NOTES

George Melford is producing "The Year of the Locust," with Fannie Ward as his star. Jack Dean and an all-star company are supporting. Melford's last feature was "A Woman's Victory" with Blanche Sweet.

Max Dill, of the team of Kolb and Dill, finds picture clowning rather strenuous. To date, he has broken both ankles and arm twice, caught cold from being soused with water and not being able to change his clothes, had his shoulder blade cracked and suffered cuts and contusions galore.

Henry Otto, Metro director, and Harold Lockwood, his star, first ocupied similar positions over five years ago, when they took a little studio at Glendale and put on a one reel picture which Otto wrote. They sold it to the Great Northern and then closed shop.

Carmen Phllips, now playing opposite Hank Mann in Fox comedies, is versatile. With one company she played ingenue leads, with the next "heavies," then appeared in two prominent character parts and is now in comedy roles.

John Steppling, Joseph Harris and Jack Mower are working with Harry Pollard, who is producing Mutual five-reelers starring Marguerita Fischer.

Nell Shipman, who has just completed a Fox play opposite William Farnum, has been engaged by the Lasky Company to play opposite Lou-Tellegen in a feature entitled "The Black Wolf."

Frederick McMonnies, the celebrated sculptor and artist, accompanied by his wife, Mrs. John P. Jones, wife of the late United States Senator from Nevada; and Mrs. Robert Farquhar, wife of a noted architect, were the guests of Phillips Smalley at Universal City a few days ago.

Kolb and Dill are about to start a film version of their stage success, "Lonesome Town."

Rea Berger, director of "Flying A" features, was married recently in Los Angeles to Miss Norma Martin.

George Fisher has become a brunette instead of a blond. The reason for the change is that he is playing the part of a young Italian illustrator in support of Clara Williams in the current Ince-Triangle drama by C. Gardner Sullivan.

William Stowell, who is leaving the American studios at Santa Barbara, was given a farewell dinner at the Arlington.

Richard Stanton, Fox director, is still at El Paso, Texas, where he is obtaining some startling scenes for the feature in which Alan Hale and Gretchen Hartman have the leading roles.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

A Tale of the Wilderness—Biograph Re-issue—October 9.—Featuring Dorothy Bernard, Charles Mailes and Edwin August. In the wilds of the Kentucky Hills two brothers, the elder an outlaw, view from a distance the approach of a party of settlers moving forward to a new home in the vast wilderness. The yonng brother is overwhelmed by the sight of the pioneers, and, unknown to his elder brother, joins their party. The settlers build a stockade home and the outlook is most rosy until the outlaw brother meets a girl from the stockade at the spring, he, of course, not knowing that his brother is among the party. He forces his attentions upon her, which she repulses, rushing back to the stockade for help. The outlaw's influence with the neighboring Indians arouses them in his plan for vengeance. They attack the stockade, and when the settlers' chance seems hopeless they dig a tunnel from the back of the stockade to the hillside. Most of them have effected an escape, but among the few captured is the younger brother, so the outlaw regrets his action and uses again his influence with the Indians, but with a different effect.

Converging Paths—(Two Reels)—Selig—October 9.—Featuring Robyn Adair and Virginia Kirtley. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

Billy's Melodrama—Vitagraph—October 9.—Featuring William Lytell, Jr., and Shirley Moore. Billy's favorite indoor sport is reading blood-curdling thrillers. But he fails to find anything in his library sufficiently exciting to hold his interest, so he decides to write a real thriller himself. He employs a hero, a heroine and a villain. Each time he throws his hero into a trying situation and each time he has the greatest difficulty getting him out of it. Finally Billy has his three characters up in an aeroplane, and the hero is about the hurl the villain to the depths below for his many crimes. But Billy in his writing has become so excited that he has thrown a lighted cigarette butt on the floor and this has ignited his celluloid collar. The room is ablaze and the fire engines are outside when Billy reaches this point in his story. When the firemen come to the rescue, Billy pleads for a few minutes to finish his story, but they drag him out unceremoniously and his story is never ended. Billy is next seen in a padded cell, where all he can say is "they're up in the clouds and I can't get them down."

The story turns out to be a dream.

A Pueblo Legend—(Two Reels)—Biograph Re-issue—October 10.—Featuring Mary Pickford, Robert Harron and Wilfred Lucas. During the Spring Dance of the Green Boughs, the Sun Priest tells the story of the turquoise stone that fell from the sky centuries before and was imbedded in the earth, the recovery of which would mean light and happiness and prosperity to the people of Isleta. The Great Brother, the exemplar of the tribe, is chosen as the one most worthy to be sent on the holy mission. The dangers and hardships which he endures during his long quest go to make a most beautiful portrayal of early Indian symbolism.

Later the children visit the hospital to make amends, for Lindy has been injured.

The Halting Hand—Big U—September 25.—With Lois Weber and Phillips Smalley. Albert and Jim, brothers, are in love with pretty Gertrude Grayson. When Jim goes away on a trip Albert tells the girl that he is dead, and so gets her to marry him. Years later the brother returns, and he persuades Gertrude to elope with him. They lose their way in the desert and Jim, while proceeding along a cliff, slips and falls into the marsh below. When Gertrude reaches him, only his hand is to be seen above the marsh. On taking the hand to help him out, it closes on her and she is held prisoner. Several days later Albert finds the two, the girl's hand still held in the vice-like grip of the protruding hand.

The White Man's Law—Big U—October 2.—Sergeant Bob Monroe, in love with the Colonel's daughter, is accused by his rival of assault and committed to a guardhouse pending trial. Florence, his sweetheart, aids him to escape. He goes to an Indian camp to get a horse, at which place he finds they are going on the warpath against the whites. They attack the fort, and many men are killed, including Bob's rival. Bob masquerades as the dead Indian chief and succeeds in scaring the Redskins away. The hero receives the hand of the Colonel's daughter and a commission as reward.

Clipped Wings—Episode No. 8 of "Liberty"—October 2.—In this episode Bob falls into the hands of the Mexicans, while Pedro, his companion, escapes. Lopez and Manuel are glad at the opportunity that is offered to settle old scores, and they announce that Bob is to be shot in Liberty's presence. But Liberty has the rifle she has stolen, and as the squad prepares to fire she covers Lopez with it and informs him that the order to fire spells his death. Lopez knows that the girl means business and does not proceed with the execution. Then Bob goes over to the window where Liberty is holding the gun and she unties his bonds.

The Memory Mill—Big U—October 2.—John is forced to serve as a seaman on a man-of-war. His sweetheart, Jane, heartbroken, sails to France in the hope of finding him. Her ship is attacked, and as a result of the fight Jane loses her memory. Later John finds her and takes her back to the scenes of her youth (they were lovers since childhood), and the sight of them brings back her memory.

The Slave—Rex—October 2.—While Colonel James is in Europe his octoroon slave exchanges his daughter for her own, and thus the slave grows up to be a lady. In after years the fiance of the Colonel's "daughter," Bob Warren, sees the slave girl and falls in love with her. Filled with jealousy, his sweetheart sells the slave to a dealer. This makes the old woman who first changed the children repent, and she confesses. Young Warren goes after the dealer and brings back the slave girl, now the lady of the house, to be his bride, and the real slave is so angry that she kills both herself and her mother.

Lorelei, an American opera singer, who has won much popularity in Mexico, is loved by Sarpina, governor of the province, but his suit is scorned, as the singer is engaged to Marion Leslie, an artist and sculptor, who has charge of the decoration of a cathedral in the city. Clifford, the American consul, is found dangerous to Sarpina, and is thrown into prison, from which he is rescued by his sister, Isabel. The consul is hidden in the house of Leslie, and his hiding place is discovered by Sarpina's troops, but not before the refugee and his sister have had time to escape. Leslie's execution is ordered for midnight, and then Sarpina strikes a bargain with Lorelei. If she will give herself to him he will save her fiance's life and provide passports for two out of the country. Lorelei stabs Sarpina to death, and, placing candles at his head and feet, as does Tosca in the opera, faints beside the body. In the dawn she recovers consciousness, and with the passports goes to seek Leslie. She finds him shot to death.

President William J. Dunn of the Eagle Film Manufacturing and Producing Company, has returned to Chicago from a visit to New York in the interests of the company and to witness the first releases of the Tweedledum series of comedies.

Our attention was recently called to the fact that every time a certain Chicago morning newspaper's film critic "knocks" a picture, the exhibitors scramble into the exchanges in the hope of being able to book it first. A number of the exchange managers have been seriously considering the advisability of paying this critic to "knock" their products.

The Seattle Paramount exchange is just whipping its new publicity department into shape. J. H. Hill, former road man out of Seattle for Paramount, has been made manager and has been given a room and a secretary of his own. Mr. Hill is very enthusiastic about the benefits that Paramount in its new publicity campaign is going to confer upon the Paramount exhibitor, such as is shown in the catalogue they are getting out, and he gave me a set of the small pictures of Paramount's beautiful stars which they have had made for the exhibitors to give their patrons. These pictures certainly ought to be an inducement for people to go where they can get them, especially since they can get a large one when the set of ten have been collected.

Fred C. Quimby, Northwestern manager for Pathe, recently invented a very clever advertisement for "The Iron Claw" and "The Laughing Mask." He asked the manager of Hyde's exclusive confectionery shop to put on his menu an "Iron Claw" sundae and a "Laughing Mask" sundae. The manager agreed and forthwith there appeared a delicious concoction of ice cream and other good things topped by two sections of orange arranged so as to look like the much advertised "Iron Claw," and another topped by fruit cut and placed to resemble the eyes, nose and mouth of the well known "Laughing Mask." They made a big hit.

M. Rosenberg, manager of the De Luxe Feature Film Company of Seattle, has just returned from New York, where he closed contracts with Lewis J. Selznick and Mutual for the Clara Kimball Young features and for "Purity," respectively, in the four states of Washington, Oregon, Montana and Idaho. He plans to handle "Purity" as a big road attraction, running three road shows, and he reports the contracts already practically closed for the Clara Kimball Young features in Seattle, Tacoma, Spokane, Portland and Butte. Al Rosenberg, his brother, is leaving for Montana in a few days to see to the booking of these two shows and the other features to which they hold state rights. Among the latter are "The Ne'er Do Well," the new edition of "The Spoilers," "Neptune's Daughter," "Cabiria, "The Christian," and "The Little Girl Next Door." From this list it is plain to be seen that the De Luxe Company handles only the biggest features, of which the manager tells me they have first choice in this territory.

The Kind of Pictures You Want The Way You Want Them

GREATER Vitagraph has placed itself in a position where exhibitors are assured of two vital advantages:

Productions that are supreme in the field—incomparable in their seat-selling qualities.

A booking system so elastic as to meet the preference of every individual exhibitor.

This booking system is the broadest policy in the motion picture industry. It may be summed up in one sentence:

Pictures sold to you the way you want to buy them.

In other words, your own method of booking—that which your personal experience has proved makes for your individual best interests—is the way we want to sell pictures to you.

Could any plan be fairer—more ideal?

TRIANGLE

RELEASES FOR WEEK OF OCTOBER 15

Sir Herbert Tree in "The Old Folks at Home." Triangle-Fine Arts.

Now you are offered the opportunity of presenting to your patrons that famous English actor, Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, who without a doubt is the greatest stage star to appear on the screen. Knighted in England for his distinguished services to the drama, Sir Herbert has a world-wide reputation.

For years your patrons have heard of him, and now that they have an opportunity to see him in a Triangle Play few will miss the opportunity.

And this isn't just an ordinary picture. It's a strong, vital play that is built around one of the biggest emotional elements—the love of parents for their children. It touches the heart strings of every one—parents and children alike.

There is no question but that this picture will be one of your biggest pullers.

W. S. Hart in "The Return of Draw Egan." Triangle-Kay Bee.

The huge value of W. S. Hart as a money getter needs no emphasis to the exhibitor. Past experience has proved that no star is more popular than this screen actor. His personality seems to reach right down and "get" every one—man, woman or child. They can't seem to help loving him even in his "bad-man" parts.

And that's the kind of a part he has in "The Return of Draw Egan," a speedy, breezy, Western drama in which Hart takes the part of a sheriff quick on the "draw," always with a chip on his shoulder and ready to fight at a moment's notice.

President Wilson Against Censorship

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION COMMITTEE ALSO RECEIVED BY HUGHES

THAT the importance and power of the motion picture industry is receiving recognition from the highest circles is demonstrated by the fact that President Wilson and Charles Evans Hughes have cordially received special committees representing the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry. The object of that committee was to gain from the men expressions of their views upon censorship.

As a result of the conference with President Wilson at Shadow Lawn on October 3, the motion picture men left feeling that the president is unquestionably opposed to the principle of censorship.

An event which marks an epoch in the picture industry—the National Association committee interviewing President Wilson on the question of censorship. Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Company, is seen at the right.

William A. Brady, president of the association, introduced to the president Walter W. Irwin of the Greater Vitagraph Company, chairman of the executive committee, who briefly presented the case of the motion picture industry, as follows:

In behalf of the motion picture industry, permit me to express our appreciation of your consideration and courtesy in granting to us this privilege. The picture in motion has become one of the most, if not the most, important mediums of thought transmission.

Twenty millions of people in the United States daily view the motion picture. To them it has become the chief means of entertainment and education. Five hundred millions of dollars are invested in this industry, and our employes number nearly a million. And yet the very existence of the industry, together with the fundamental principles of our democratic institutions are threatened by the un-American principle of censorship.

As a result, the industry has at last organized for its own protection and for the protection of the American people. It now possesses a National Association comprising representatives of every branch of the industry, and many of those who do business with one or more of the branches.

Today the industry, through this association, stands as a unit against the principle of censorship. In Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kansas and Maryland, censorship statutes exist, by which we are compelled to submit our product, prior to publication, for the approval or disapproval of a political board.

Next winter forty-eight state legislatures meet, and it is our information that this industry is to be the chief target of various small minorities who seek to determine what their brothers shall see or think.

Last winter a similar censorship bill, known as the Hughes bill, was introduced into Congress and approved by a majority of the Educational Committee. It is our understanding that this bill will be re-introduced at the next session of Congress. If the Hughes bill is passed and signed, and if similar procedure is taken in a number of the various states, we will virtually be legislated out of existence.

We do not seek privilege. We desire only the same liberty enjoyed in this country by the press, the drama, art and other mediums of thought transmission; but with full responsibility for our acts. We seek to obtain our day in court—equal rights under the law.

Last winter we had introduced in Congress an amendment to the Federal Penal Code, which would impose heavy penalties for the transportation in interstate commerce of any improper film. This amendment failed of passage.

We recognize our full responsibility to the people, and we want to be held strictly accountable. What we ask, Mr. President, is an expression from the president of his views upon the principle of censorship which we deem so important, not only to ourselves, but to the people.

We know that with your love for American freedom, you cannot countenance censorship in this country, and we likewise know that an expression from the president will go a long ways towards preventing the re-introduction of the Hughes bill and of similar bills in the forty-eight states whose legislatures meet next winter.

The motion picture delegation felt from the president's manner and his informal observation on the subject in the event of future legislative action in relation to moving pictures that he would extend a guiding hand—a hand of entire justice to the industry. It was also manifested that the president fully recognized the danger of serious abuses consequent upon the arbitrary exercise of private judgment, where public judgment alone ought to sway the matter.

Those Who Saw Wilson

The delegation was composed of William A. Brady, president of the association and of the World Film Corporation; P. A. Powers, treasurer of the Universal Film Company; Carl Laemmle, of Universal; Walter W. Irwin, of the Greater Vitagraph; William Sherrill, president of the Frohman Amusement Company; J. H. Hallberg, of New York, representing the Supply and Equipment Division; Samuel H. Trigger, of the Tremont Theater, New York; and Henry Branson Varner of North Carolina, representing the exhibitors; W. Stephen Bush, Moving Picture World; Wm. A. Johnston, president of the Motion Picture News; Fred Hawley, of the Motion Picture Directory; "Wid" Gunning, Frederick H. Elliott, executive secretary of the National Association; L. P. Rogers, of the Fox Film Company; Britton N. Busch, of the World Film Corporation; Randolph Lewis, director of publicity; Adam Hull Shirk, of the Morning Telegraph, and W. K. Whipple, of the Animated Weekly.

Mr. Hughes' Opinions on Censorship

A body similar to that which called on the president, interviewed Charles Evans Hughes, Republican candidate for the presidency, at the Essex County Country Club, Montclair, New Jersey, on Saturday, October 7. The trip was made by motor.

Walter W. Irwin presented the ideas of the National Association in about the same substance as for President Wilson.

In his reply to Mr. Irwin's address, Mr. Hughes made it plain that he was speaking informally and that no remarks of his should be construed as a final expression of opinion. He stated that he has definite and clear ideas as to both the importance and the future of the motion picture industry and the question of censorship. He pronounced an eloquent eulogy of the motion picture, the possibilities of which, to his way of thinking, were even now but faintly appreciated by the people.

He spoke of the important part which the screen was destined to play in education and left no doubts whatever in the minds of his hearers that he considered the motion picture the most direct and the most appealing medium for reaching the mind.

He touched briefly on the civic value of the screen in a democracy, pointing out that it performed a most valuable mission in instructing the people and especially the young generation, which will approach its duty in public affairs with proper knowledge of facts and conditions.

Mr. Hughes, in vigorous language, expressed himself on the question of federal control of the subject, qualifying everything he said with the emphatic declaration that he was only stating his opinion as a lawyer and that he was not speaking in a formal or final manner.

He described the pursuit of the idea that federal control where there is no federal exigency as a "will-o'-the-wisp." The gathering which listened to Mr. Hughes was impressed by his wide-visioned appreciation of the motion picture as an intellectual moral and educational force and characterized the future of the motion picture as one that defied prophecy in its wonderful and ultimate development. He would not like to see anything hamper its progress.

"The possibilities of the motion picture are faintly appreciated by our people," said he. "It is destined to play marvelous part in our education in the future. By virtue of the motion picture today," he indicated, "education and mental improvement are open to millions of persons who heretofore had been deprived of the benefit."

The impression gained by the members of the National Association of the Motion Picture Association, from the remarks of Mr. Hughes, was that he is opposed to the principle of censorship; that any censorship must necessarily be viewed with misgiving as history has proven it leads to abuse; that it is dangerous to submit the public conscience to a board, although there are many who think themselves qualified to judge on behalf of the public.

Mr. Hughes further impressed all with the idea that federal censorship would in no way affect state or local censorship and that he was opposed to any federal action which could not be justified by a federal exigency. While Mr. Hughes could not declare himself upon a question of this nature, yet his disposition and feelings were opposed to censorship under political conditions such as we enjoy.

Immediately after meeting the delegation Mr. Hughes permitted himself to be photographed. While he was making his address the machines ground continually from all angles.

A luncheon was served to the film men, after which speeches were made by ex-Senator Colby, Mayor Raymond of Newark, Lee A. Ochs, William A. Brady and Charles Hespe, head of the New Jersey Exhibitors' League. The consensus of opinion was that the new National Association, in the short time of its existence, has done much to make the motion picture industry a power in the country.

Those Who Called on Hughes

The special committee representing the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry, which was received by Charles Evans Hughes at the Essex County Country Club, West Orange, N. J., Saturday, October 7, was as follows:

Illinois Exhibitors Hold First Open Meeting

MEMBERSHIP AND NEW PICK-UP SYSTEM DISCUSSED

ON October 6 the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Illinois held its first open meeting, invitations having been sent out a week in advance. A good-sized crowd attended. A Dutch luncheon was served and the meeting as a whole was lively and interesting.

Considerable stress was laid on the importance of all exhibitors becoming members of the League to help shoulder the burden now being carried by a small percentage of the total number in the business. Quite a number of new members were enrolled and voted upon in the open meeting. All were elected without a dissenting vote.

Various subjects of pertinence to the industry were discussed by the following speakers: H. Schoenstadt, William J. Sweeney, Adolph Powell, H. Lieberthal, R. O. Proctor, R. Fulton, Sam Katz, Louis H. Frank, Alfred Hamburger, Joseph Hopp, Chas. Abrams, Sidney Smith, Geo. Laing.

M. A. Choynski of the Newberry Theater opened the meeting with a strong plea to non-members to join the league, and pointed out to them the advantages in doing so. He told them that when they had any grievances to be settled it would be much easier to do so if the arguments were backed by a body as strong as the Exhibitors' League of Illinois. He called attention to the fact that the Exhibitors' League of America, of which the Illinois branch is a unit, had in one single day crushed the dangerous Wheeler-Oakman bill, which if it had been passed would have placed a heavy additional tax on the shoulders of every exhibitor in the country. He reminded the gathering that the city tax on picture theaters would soon be due and payable. He also said that the license fee at present is entirely too high, and in no uncertain words suggested that they could be cut down at this time if everybody interested would work towards this end.

If the League is successful in getting this fee cut, it will probably be a sufficient saving to pay the initiation fee, as well as the first year's dues as a member of the League. Any other benefits which may be derived through being a member of this association will then come gratis.

Hamburger Makes Live Offer

Alfred Hamburger being so positive that new members would get full value for the money they spent, said that he would personally return the initiation fee as well as all dues paid to the League to any man who joined and did not get full value for every dollar he expended. He was heartily applauded by everybody in the room.

H. Lieberthal vouched the information that regardless of what business was spoken of, there always are a certain number of people interested in it who are either too careless to look out for their own interests or are "tight wads," penny wise and pound foolish. "These people," he said, "always depend on the other fellow to do the hard work and when the benefits of his endeavors are reaped they take their share without showing the slightest appreciation." Mr. Lieberthal maintained that a good portion of those exhibitors who are not yet members of the League might be placed in this class.

R. Fulton, manager of the Victoria Theater of Chicago, disagreed with Mr. Lieberthal and said that he thought more of the exhibitors who are not members of the League, are not members because they have never been properly approached on the subject.

Pick-up System Discussed

Considerable comment was given the proposed new pick-up and delivery service, which is to be conducted by the Charles L. Levy Film Service Company and which was presented to the assemblage by R. O. Proctor, manager of the Metro Chicago office, and L. J. Neiss, representing MOTOGRAPHY.

A few years back it was a well-known fact that exhibitors of motion pictures were victimized at every opportunity and there are at present a few exhibitors, who were evidently "gypped" at various times in the past, who view each new proposition which is presented to them as having been primarily conceived to cheat them in a new way.

Mr. Proctor called attention to the fact that in endorsing this new service the exhibitors automatically shifted the responsibility for film, in transit between the theater and the exchange, from the theater owner to the carrying company. The latter proposes to put up a bond sufficient in size to cover any losses which might be sustained and which is entirely acceptable to the exchanges. Mr. Proctor said that the Chicago F.I.L.M. Club, composed of exchange men, had investigated the company behind the new service and said that it was undoubtedly all that was claimed for it.

A gentleman present raised an objection to endorsing the service because he could not see how the film service company would be able to eliminate some of the mistakes which occur. One of the points he raised was, "What will these people do in the event that an exchange is unable to deliver the film to them in time to permit the theater's opening at the usual time?" The explanation given was that the Levy Circulating Company, which is in back of the proposed new service, is a dependable, well established concern in and about Chicago, who handle the entire city delivery of one of the large Chicago morning papers and have charge of the city distribution of fifteen national magazines. The service would call the theater manager over the 'phone and advise him of their inability to obtain his show, thus enabling him to arrange for something else in its lieu which might be brought out to him in time to open his show at the regular hour.

Mr. Proctor was asked to go into conference with the executive committee and advise more fully on the plans of the Levy Film Service Company at the next regular meeting. This plan assures each proposition which comes up for consideration a fair chance and will prevent any wasted opportunities to better conditions.

Resolutions opposing street carnivals were adopted and a committee consisting of Messrs. Schoenstadt, Katz and Frank were instructed to present said resolutions to the mayor of Chicago, to the commissioner of streets, state's attorney, and the city council.

The most important news imparted to the League members was that a truce had been declared between the two operators' unions and all differences have been settled for the present by a board of arbitration.

Another meeting of the same sort will be held after the next regular meeting, which takes place on the first Friday in November. The committee on arrangements promised to have more cheese sandwiches.

JERSEY EXHIBITORS MEET

Prominent Speakers Address First Annual Convention of Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New Jersey—Officers Elected

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of the State of New Jersey held its first annual convention on October 4 at Newark, N. J. The meeting was opened by Mayor Thomas L. Raymond, who advocated a square deal for the exhibitors, and spoke in favor of the motion picture as a means of bringing families together. W. Stephen Bush responded in a brief address and pointed out to the mayor the fallacies of censorship.

Walter W. Irwin, general manager of the Greater Vitagraph Company, gave a lengthy address on organization, censorship and other matters relative to the industry.

The Rev. Dr. Howard, in speaking on the question of the observance of the Sabbath, stated that he believed that the ministry and the motion picture people should get together and make a mutually satisfactory agreement as to the observance thereof.

Lee A. Ochs, president of the National League, made an energetic speech on organization and cooperation and pointed out the many benefits gained thereby. He was given an ovation when introduced.

An executive session was held at which a permanent state organization was formed and the following officers elected:

President, Dr. H. Charles Hespe, of Jersey City; vice-president, Mr. Rockefellow, of Asbury Park; treasurer, Mr. Crawford, of Newark; secretary, Mr. Bornstein, of Newark; sergeant-at-arms, Mr. Adams, of Paterson.

Mr. Ochs complimented the New Jersey exhibitors upon their successful start and presented them with a charter from the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and thereupon turned the gavel over to Dr. Hespe.

The following committees were appointed with power to enlarge; to interview all candidates in reference to censorship and Sunday opening, including the Assemblymen, Senators and Governor: Messrs. Meyer of Newark, Raleigh of Jersey City and Anderson of Passaic.

Mrs. Webb, a prominent exhibitor, was appointed chairlady to keep the women's clubs in touch with censorship and Sunday opening problems.

Mr. Sherwin of the National Board of Review addressed the meeting briefly, inquiring as to the exhibitors' stand on white slavery pictures and the nude in art, which they unanimously voted against.

London Distributor in New York

Thomas Davison, of the Davison Film Agency of London, who is one of Great Britain's largest distributors of films, will arrive in New York in a few days for the purpose of looking into various propositions that have been made to his organization in regard to the foreign distribution of American films. He will bring a number of British productions with him.

Davison is one of the best known authorities on foreign markets for films in the world.

Theaters Running Government Picture

The screen has now become a forum for the discussion of politics.

The first well-defined and carefully produced picture relating directly to the government has been presented by the Motion Picture Forum Company of New York City. The film, which is one reel in length, is called "The Government in Action." New York houses are now running the feature and a showing for the trade and press was given in Chicago on October 9 at the V-L-S-E Theater.

Sam Spedon, formerly of the Vitagraph Company and for years a prominent figure in the film industry, is representing the Forum Company in Chicago and has charge of the promotion of its productions in that territory. "The Government in Action" is furnished to exhibitors free. A large number of Chicago houses are booking it. The film is of real interest, showing the President and various cabinet members at their desks talking, and the captions explain the work of each man and his department and give concrete examples of what has been accomplished under the present administration. The photography is splendid and the film has an unusual finish. The captions are hand lettered.

The Democratic National Committee is to make use of the picture in its promotion work. The unusual film has received high praise from Lee A. Ochs, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, and a prominent exhibitor in New York; Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and David Wark Griffith. There is no doubt but that "The Government in Action" is the harbinger of a movement which will make the screen one of the most powerful political forces.

The Forum Company, of which C. R. Macauley, formerly of the New York World, is president, now has several other similar productions under way.

"Garden of Allah" Completed

It is stated that "The Garden of Allah" has been completed by Colin Campbell at the Los Angeles, Cal., studios of the Selig Polyscope Company and that the public will be permitted to view the film dramatization of Robert Hichens' novel in the not far distant future.

It is claimed that "The Garden of Allah" will prove to be the most beautiful production ever filmed by the Selig Company which company has an enviable reputation for presenting wonderful feature films.

Those who have viewed the original prints of "The Garden of Allah" assert that Helen Ware and Thomas Santschi both achieve artistic triumphs and their their work is powerful. They are assisted by an all-star cast including Harry Lonsdale, Eugenie Besserer, James Bradbury, Will Machin and others.

The defeat of Senator Cristman at the New York primaries recently by reason of the active opposition of the motion picture interests was the direct cause of J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of Pathe, becoming a member of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry.

ACTUAL CRITICISM OF FILMS BY EXHIBITORS, FROM A BUSINESS STANDPOINT

(Editorial Note:—"The trade paper that can give the most accurate information about current features is the paper every exhibitor wants," said a prominent manager recently. In addition to its regular reviews, MOTOGRAPHY will each week hereafter print the actual unvarnished opinions of exhibitors on films they have run in their houses, with the idea of aiding other exhibitors in making up their programs. Managers and bookers like to get various opinions concerning a feature before they run it. Upon request MOTOGRAPHY will gladly furnish the opinions of men who have run the feature in question. Simply address, MOTOGRAPHY, Chicago.)

Manager Jack Cuneo, the New Dearborn Theater on Division street, has the following to say regarding pictures he has recently run:

"THE DAUGHTER OF MCGREGOR, featuring Valentine Grant, Frohman, is a picture with a rare combination of laughs and thrills with a touch of pathos. This picture proved a fine attraction at my house.

"THE SHIELDING SHADOW, featuring Grace Darmond, is a wonderful serial with a punch in every episode.

"W. H. Hart in THE DAWN MAKER, Triangle, is dragged out entirely too much.

"Pauline Frederick, featured in ASHES OF EMBERS, Frohman, does some really excellent work. The picture as a whole is very good.

Division of National Body Meets

A very successful branch meeting of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry was held on October 4, when the members of the Supply and Equipment Division and a group of interested non-members held a rousing get-together conference. J. E. Brulatour, of the Eastman Film Company, was the chairman, and he heard from the men in the various lines facts of which they have had cause for bitter complaint of watchful methods by which the entire industry must suffer and the processes by which they can be met and corrected, of the lack of understanding that keeps apart many men working for the same general purpose.

J. H. Hallberg sounded the keynote of the meeting in a ringing address. Not theory, but active, aggressive work and a better understanding of the other fellow, not in your line. Protective agreements must follow the building up of the family and members should so demonstrate the power and purpose of the association that every man in the industry must feel that it is necessary for him to become a part of it.

The Supply and Equipment Division, in its full development, will be one of the largest—if not the largest—in the National Association. For that reason Joseph F. Coufal, who has worked in many lines of the industry, suggested that each business organize its own body for the better expedition of results, for where a class of men understood each other or each other's work, time-wasting explanations were done away with and the whole scheme would work for efficiency and dispatch. This matter will be taken up at the next meeting.

Addresses were also made by Don J. Bell, S. M. Jacobi, Executive Secretary Elliott, B. F. Porter and Phil. Wolf.

There were present at the meeting:

B. F. Porter, Precision Machine Co.; H. D. Coles; Henry Eckerdt; S. N. Jacobi; Wm. H. Easton, Westinghouse Co.; John Basset, secretary Fred Waller Co.; Mr. Scott and E. Van Altena, Scott and Van Altena; Fred A. Apfelbaum, Perfection Slide Co.; Herbert C. Brewer, The Barrett Co.; J. C. Moulton, General Electric Co.; J. H. Hallberg, S. White, Jos. F. Coufal, Novelty Slide Co.; Don. J. Bell; J. F. Skerrett, Nicholas Power Co.; Phil Wolf, representing Washed Air Cooling Heating Vent. Co.

Powell Advocates Plays With Purpose

Frank Powell, president of the Frank Powell Productions, Inc., is a firm advocate of public censorship. He believes that the adult who goes to the theater or the motion picture house is the best guardian of his or her individual morals. From a strictly commercial standpoint the indecent play or film may flourish for a time but it invariably is the wholesome product that enjoys lasting success, and every man who is producing is endeavoring to offer that which will achieve lasting success. The screen will ultimately be an enormous factor in public education and the pictures produced with a purpose—that is, pictures which in addition to presenting a drama show different conditions of public welfare which can be best brought before the public on the screen, will be the ones to endure.

With this aim in view, Mr. Powell produced "Charity?" which is an appeal to the people to rectify the abuse of charity by showing the conditions resulting from misuse of charitable funds as contrasted with conditions where such funds are properly and efficiently expended.

Arbitrators Report on Oklahoma Strike

By Wm. N. Noble,
Special correspondent for Motography.

The State Board of Arbitration at Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, has made the following finding in the strike situation at Oklahoma City and Tulsa:

We recommend that the stage employes and local managers enter into a contract, embracing the following points: That nothing but union stage employes be employed in the city in theaters controlled by the managers, that the rate of wages be increased $3 per week, in accordance with the demand of the stage employes at the time of the strike, which makes the rate of wages as follows: Master carpenters, $24 per week; property managers, $18 per week; assistant carpenters, $18 per week; the said week's work to consist of seven days.

We further recommend that the hours of work be so arranged by the managers that it will be unnecessary for stage employes to report before 11 o'clock a. m., that they have proper relief periods for lunch and supper and that they be not required to work later than 10:30 p. m.

As to the proposition of theater managers using nothing but members of the White Rats' union, the board does not feel qualified, at this time, to pass judgment upon this important issue by reason of the fact that Oklahoma City is one of a chain of cities on circuits which are booked by foreign concerns or booking agents, located outside the state, and we, therefore, doubt the feasibility of imposing upon the managers in Oklahoma City this duty. We understand that the managers have in the past operated with a closed shop in so far as the local men are concerned, and that it is possible to carry out such a contract with the White Rats Actors' union, but on account of the conditions before mentioned, we see that the matter is questionable and we believe that if a thorough trial is given it will demonstrate whether or not the plan is feasible.

We are convinced from the testimony presented before this board, and after a thorough examination of the contracts under which the managers procure the acts, that the contract in universal use in this country is unjust, both to the actor and to the management. We recommend to the state legislature that it enact such laws as will protect the actors and managers operating in the state of Oklahoma.

We further find from the evidence presented, the existence of a combination that controls managers and actors throughout the United States and we recommend to the United States Congress that the proper laws be enacted to regulate the booking agents of those employed by, through or under him and his contracts, which we believe will be of mutual benefit to both actor and manager.

The above findings are not binding upon the parties in the strike, but may be of value in court proceedings and influencing legislation.

The strike still continues and the picketing of theaters is being kept up.

Morosco-Pallas Sign House Peters

House Peters, the well-known motion picture "heavy," has just signed a contract in New York with Morosco-Pallas and will accordingly again appear on the Paramount Program, where he has gained wide popularity in the past.

Under the Famous Players and Lasky brands, Mr. Peters became established as a screen actor of unusual dramatic ability. His excellent characterizations immediately placed him in the front ranks of filmdom's most accomplished artists, among his most notable offerings being those evidenced in "The Bride of Jenico," "The Bishop's Carriage," "Chelsea 7750," and "An Hour Before Dawn."

Immediately after signing his contract to appear on the screen for Morosco-Pallas, Mr. Peters arranged to leave for the West Coast studios.

Screen Club Elects New Officers

The new Screen Club quarters in 45th street, New York, were treated to their first scenes of real activity on Saturday evening, October 7, when the annual election was held. When all the returns were in it was announced that Billy Quirk was re-elected president; Edwin Carew, first vice president; Paul Scardon, second vice president; Oscar Eagle, third vice president; Anthony P. Kelly, corresponding secretary; Robert E. Welsh, recording secretary; Will C. Smith, treasurer. The new board of governors, elected for a term of two years, is comprised of E. K. Lincoln, Wm. Haddock, Harry Solter and Frank J. Carrol.

"Blind Justice," the film made by Benjamin Christie, the Danish actor-manager, was shown to the prisoners of Sing Sing Prison on October 7. The unusual audience was very responsive to the story unfolded upon the screen. Thomas Mott Osborne, the warden, had invited a number of New Yorkers to witness the exhibition.

Pallas-Morosco Joins Famous-Lasky

ALL PARAMOUNT PRODUCERS MERGE BUT RELEASE UNDER INDIVIDUAL BANNER

ANOTHER important affiliation of picture producing companies has been announced in the combining of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company and Pallas Pictures, both of whose productions appear on the Paramount Program, with the Famous Players Film Company and the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company in the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. This merger, which has been contemplated for two years, represents the forces of photoplay production constituting the entire Paramount Program, which releases 104 feature plays annually, or two every week. The identities of the several companies represented in the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation will continue to be distinct in the productions seen on the screens of theaters throughout the world.

Conferences Held in East and West

The negotiations tending to this affiliation began in Los Angeles and were terminated last Thursday in New York. These conferences were attended by Adolph Zukor, president of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation; Jesse L. Lasky, vice-president; Arthur S. Friend, treasurer; E. J. Ludvigh, secretary; Oliver Morosco, president of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company; Miss Melodile Garbutt, president Pallas Pictures; Frank A. Garbutt, vice-president; William G. Demorest, Frederick G. Lee and Daniel Frohman. Miss Garbutt and Mr. Garbutt came to New York from Los Angeles recently to attend the conferences.

Galaxy of Stars Combined by Merger

This combination will bring under one banner the greatest number of popular stage and screen stars ever assembled in a single organization, including Marguerite Clark, Pauline Frederick, Marie Doro, Fannie Ward, Leonore Ulrich, Blanche Sweet, Mae Murray, Myrtle Stedman, Louise Huff, Owen Moore, Marguerite Courtot, Jack Pickford, Vivian Martin, Cleo Ridgley, Lou-Tellegen, Dustin Farnum, Ann Pennington, Sessue Hayakawa, George Beban, Wallace Reid and many others. The photoplay features bearing the names of "Morosco" and "Pallas" will continue to be produced at the studio in Los Angeles.

Zukor Comments on Amalgamation

Adolph Zukor, in commenting upon the amalgation of these film interests, said:

This latest coalition unites under one government and one system of operation all the producing forces that create the Paramount Program. While these individual companies formerly cooperated with complete harmony toward the maintenance of the highest possible standard of motion picture production, under the new arrangement the opportunities for common artistic endeavor will be more numerous and extensive. This is the aspiration of all the factors in the Paramount group of producers, and undoubtedly the results that will accrue will be as beneficial as are all the effects of a unity of purpose. The interchange of stars, plays and studio equipment among the four plants will also constitute a more elastic and expansive producing force.

Garbutt of Pallas-Morosco Speaks

Frank A. Garbutt of the Pallas-Morosco companies, said:

This amalgamation of interests is the logical outcome of plans which have been in contemplation ever since the formation of Paramount two years ago. Each company will retain its individuality and will go on manufacturing pictures as heretofore. The individual companies will, however, have a direct interest in the welfare and success of the other producers, thereby tending to provide the Paramount Program with pictures of increasing excellence in quality and with service that is truly "Paramount."

Morosco Says Step in Right Direction

Oliver Morosco, president of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company, in speaking of the affiliation, said:

The merging of our interests with those of the Famous Players and the Jesse L. Lasky Company is the natural tendency of the times towards the quality of photoplays. The photoplay industry is gradually undergoing parallel changes to those in the theatrical business, namely, the survival of the fittest. To this end the coalition of the four Paramount producing companies is a step in the right direction. The advantages to the producers are economy in operation and increased efficiency; to Paramount this new step means a pronounced increase in the merit of the pictures; to the exhibitors it is an insurance that Paramount Pictures will keep pace with the demands of the day.

Abrams Congratulates Factors Involved

Hiram Abrams, president of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, congratulated the factors involved and made the following statement:

At last the complete unification of the producing interests of Paramount has been accomplished. The combination under one management of the four producers may be expected to result in both a greater variety and a greater consistency of merit in the productions to appear on the Paramount Program.

EIGHTY HOUSES OPEN FILM

Artcraft Pictures' First Production, "Less Than the Dust," with Mary Pickford, to Appear the Country Over on November 6

November 6 has been set by Artcraft Pictures Corporation as the release date for Mary Pickford's first superior production, "Less Than the Dust." On that day eighty theaters in the United States will show this picture simultaneously. This is believed to be a record for a feature of the length of "Less Than the Dust." The list, which is nearly completed, promises to be a formidable one and includes practically all the most prominent circuits in the country. A conservative estimate of the number of people who will see Mary Pickford in her first appearance as an independent star at the head of her own producing company places the total at the staggering figure of 300,000.

Among the notable additions made recently to the number of theaters which have booked the new Artcraft productions are the circuits of S. Katz, Ascher Bros. and Lubliner and Trinz in Chicago. Max Goldstine, manager of the Chicago exchange, has already booked Mary Pickford productions in more than thirty houses in that city. This preliminary chain will keep "Less Than the Dust" in Chicago for exactly 100 days. Jones, Linnick & Schaeffer's Colonial and Bijou Dream have signed for two weeks for each picture. The Alhambra in Milwaukee is another big first run house and Mr. Goldstine's list includes theaters in Illinois, Southern Wisconsin and Eastern Iowa.

Arthur G. Whyte in the New York exchange has put on the Academy of Music as a companion to the Strand, and reports that negotiations for other large and popular houses are approaching a satisfactory conclusion. Every state in New England is well represented in the business obtained by the Boston exchange. Cincinnati, Cleveland, Washington, Baltimore, St. Louis, Kansas City, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Butte, Denver, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland and Seattle are other centers which are to have Artcraft service for long runs in numerous theaters.

Tickets for Exhibitors

An innovation has been introduced by Triangle in its supply department, which is making the purchase of posters and other advertising material much easier, and is cutting out the little annoyance of C. O. D. shipments which have bothered both the H. O. people and the exhibitors.

A book containing 150 stamps is now issued, for sale to exhibitors. There are stamps of varying denominations from one cent to 25 cents, the total value of the book being $10. This amount the exhibitor pays on receipt of the book, then, as he wants supplies, he tears out sufficient stamps to cover his order, and sends them to the branch manager, by mail or by messenger, as the case may be.

This method entirely does away with the 25-cent collection charge of the express company, which always attended C. O. D. shipments, and which in the case of a small order amounted to a very considerable percentage of the actual cost of the material.

By both the branch managers and the exhibitors the plan has been received with satisfaction. The former are provided with what amounts to a cash deposit from the exhibitors, without the trouble of bookkeeping and the rendering of weekly or monthly statements; the latter is relieved of the same amount of detail, and in addition is provided with a means of remittance which may be transmitted without cost, and is much more satisfactory to give to a messenger than the equivalent in cash.

Ford Visits Universal City

Henry Ford, manufacturer of the well advertised automobile, visited Universal City on September 15, spending five hours there with Mrs. Ford and his party, which consisted of P. L. D. Perry, Mrs. Perry and two children, Miss M. Meals of London, England, and B. L. Graves of Los Angeles.

Vice-President Davis welcomed Mr. Ford to the city and entertained him and party at luncheon. Later Mr. Ford viewed runs of the new Universal submarine spectacle, "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," the latest episode of the new Universal serial, "Liberty," and the latest sociological "film within a film," "Idle Wives."

During his visit to the laboratories and the great stages Mr. Ford met many of the stars and directors. His visit concluded with a venture into the zoo.

"Seventeen" Under Way

Actual work has been started on the Famous Players adaptation of Booth Tarkington's celebrated novel, "Seventeen," in which Louise Huff and Jack Pickford are co-starring under the direction of Robert G. Vignola, for the Paramount program. The others in the cast include Winnifred Allen, Madge Evans, Helen Lindroth, Walter Hiers, Dick Lee, Richard Rosson, Julian Dillon and Anthony Merlo.

The Rolin Company has just made their first two-reel comedy for Pathe. Judging from the unanimous approval by the Pathe Film committee of "Luke's Lively Life," which was the name of the comedy, others of the same length may be seen in the near future. Harold Lloyd, Harry Pollard and Bebe Daniels are in the cast and their antics in the big restaurant scenes are indescribably funny.

Dorothy Davenport, Emory Johnson and Adele Farrington are playing the leading parts in "The Devil's Die," being filmed at Universal City.

Screenshine

By Mel Ody

DOWN in a little Illinois house where the transparent ribbons flutter three nights a week the audiences were mystified during the run of a certain wild west feature by the sound of sudden "snaps" and peculiar "chugs" coming from a dark corner near the screen. A good many of these mysterious noises occurred when the trap drummer was doing his darndest so only a few folks noticed it.

Finally the rumpus percolated to the manager and he went down into the dark corner. A speckled-faced kid hurriedly shoved something under the seat. Mr. Exhibitor reached under and pulled out a wooden air gun. His chum had another stuck under his coat.

If those redskins dashing across the screen had been alive they would have been full of BB shot.

As it was those valiantly fired rifle balls only let the screenshine through the screen, as a sieve might do.

THEY BRAVED THE BREEZES

Among the celluloid notables who blew in and blew out of Chicago during the past few days where Carl Laemmle, C. R. Williamson, the diving photographer, Joe Brandt, E. S. Brakley, Sam Spedon, George Fawcett, actor, and Albert Hale.

VERSATILE BILL

Arthur James assures us that Bill Sweeney is now acting for Metro at the Rolfe studios. We saw Bill at the Exhibitors' Temple in Chicago last week and he said he was going away soon. The sly rascal. Well, Bill would put up a good-sized front at most anything.

Arrived, by U. S. (Uncle Stork) mail on October 6, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Jose in New York, a ten-pound baby—no, not boy—daughter. We can imagine the Pathe director out-directed. And there's a friend exhibitor of ours down in London, Ohio, who is now exhibiting in his house a brand new feature in which a lusty-lunged, nine-pound boy plays the lead. Mr. Lawwill tells us that sometimes he almost wishes that he could call off the performance at 11 o'clock.

A REEL TRAGEDY

Exhibitor Jason went to the station
To get the films for his show;
The reels weren't there and he tore his hair,
And swore like a trooper, you know.

WHEN BESSIE CRIED

The scene of this petite and poignant tragedy, told to us,—Mel,—by Bessie herself, was a dining car. The time, when Miss Barriscale was on her recent trip to New York. The cast was Bessie's friend, Bessie and a man friend of Bessie's friend. The man had never met Bessie. The three are seated at a table. (All right: camera.) The man inquired of Bessie's lady friend, "Are you singing this season? Of course I wouldn't insult you by asking if you are in the movies. Those people certainly are the riff-raff of the earth."

"Whereupon," said Betty, "I blushed a regular vampire red,—and,—I couldn't help it,—I just cried!"

And we—Mel—said, "There, there!"

Children Want Real Heroes in Films

BY J. B. REISMAN

Manager Dale Theater, St. Paul, Minnesota.

I HAVE not only been running special matinees for the children successfully for over a year but the very first performance ever held in my theater was for the children. That was my grand opening, and it was a grand one, for 1,400 children attended that initial entertainment.

While my theater was still in the building two ladies came to me and said they had a plan which they would like to have me work out in my house. I assured them I would be very glad to consider it for I always believe in pleasing the ladies in every way possible and think it is wisdom on the part of every exhibitor to take this attitude. It is the ladies who bring us all our business so why should we not cater to them.

If you have a good patronage of well pleased women the success of your theater is assured for they will not only come themselves but they will send the children and drag out the men. What the ladies wanted was to try out the special matinee for the kiddies on Saturday afternoon.

No theater in St. Paul had tried this scheme and they believed that there was a great field for the movement. Although I assured them that I would be very glad to try it out according to their suggestion I was rather doubtful about it myself because my theater is in the "silk stocking district" of St. Paul and I felt that the children had so many things done for them all the time that they probably would not take the interest in the special matinee which would be taken in a less wealthy neighborhood. But results proved that I was a poor judge. I opened my theater on a Saturday afternoon with the special matinee for the children, showing "Jack and the Beanstalk." The children came in such crowds that I was almost overwhelmed trying to find seats for them all. I ran two shows during the afternoon and each time to a packed house. Altogether there were 1,400 children who attended that first matinee.

Since that day these Saturday afternoon matinees for the children are a regular part of my program. I devote the whole Saturday afternoon to them and have two shows, one beginning at two o'clock and one at four. I do not run them every week, however, but every other week. As a matter of fact the semi-monthly performances for the little folks are better money-getters than the regular Saturday performances.

My regular prices for matinees are ten cents for adults and five cents for children, but at the special performances I charge ten cents for everyone and have an average of six hundred children, so I cannot sympathize with the manager who says he loses money on the children's hour. I do not run the matinees during the summer months because the people of my neighborhood are what we in St. Paul term "lake dwellers," that is, as soon as school is out they go to one of the nearby lakes and stay until school opens again, so that there is not enough patronage for the special performance during the summer, but I have opened them again now that school has started and will continue them until the summer vacation comes around.

The children range in ages from three to fourteen or sixteen, and very often a mother calls up and wants to know if the matinee is exclusively for children, or if she is allowed to come with the younger members of the family. Of course we like to have the mothers come and there are many of them always in our audience and they not only bring their own family but gather up all the youngsters in the neighborhood and bring them along. On Saturday afternoons one automobile after another drives up and deposits from ten to twelve children.

I give the children nothing but the pictures, I offer no special "stunts," have no favors to give out, or anything special to entice them and hold their interest except the pictures. I do not need anything else, the pictures alone are enough to fill my house every other week. For a couple of times I tried having a lady come and tell the children the story of the film before it was shown, but the children did not seem to care for the story and were impatient for the pictures to begin. They were restless and inattentive while the plot was being unfolded and would rather have the story told by the pictures.

My program for the children consists of a feature, a scenic or educational and a cartoon comedy. The cartoons always please and amuse the little ones and are very popular. I do not believe in showing Charlie Chaplin films to the children because they are too rough. Also when the children see some rough trick performed by Charlie on the screen they are sure to go home and try it themselves and consequently get into trouble with their parents and the blame invariably comes back to me at the theater for showing the film which gave them the idea.

The children do not care for too steady a diet of fairy stories, in fact aside from those from about three to six the fairy story does not appeal. They want to see a real hero and you will find that most children's idea of a hero is a man about twenty-one years of age. He is then just old enough to inspire them with awe and their admiration is most deep-rooted. Anyone under or over that age is too young or too old to be ideal. This is one point which many managers do not take into consideration and they will find the surest way to keep the interest of the children is by giving them films which will feed their love for real heroes. Harold Lockwood I always find a good drawing card for this reason, he appears just about the right age for an ideal hero to the children. Some of the other actors who are very popular with the older people have passed the age which clothes them with the desired glamour for the young hero worshippers. The children like thrills and mystery and romance, and I show many of the features which are released for the general program. When I am going to use one of these grown-up features for the kiddies I first run it through to see if there are any scenes which would be objectionable for the children to see. Usually I invite a number of the mothers of the neighborhood and other women interested to attend this pre-showing and ask their opinions as to what scenes should be eliminated before the small folks see the film. This pleases the ladies very much and shows them that I am conscientiously trying to give things which are suitable for children and I never have any kicks on the subjects which I have chosen for my special performances. Also I think that the judgment of the ladies in a matter of what the children should and should not see is better than my own, and I am glad to have their advice.

The chief difficulty with the program for the children is the lack of suitable pictures to show to them. It is very hard to find enough to fill an afternoon even every other week and I believe many more exhibitors would cater to the younger generation if they could find suitable material more easily. I have talked with one or two of the manufacturers on this subject and they claim that they would be glad to produce this kind of material but there is so little market for it. They say that it is much cheaper and easier to produce and there would be more money in it for them if there was enough call for the finished product, but there is not. Many of the pictures which they have manufactured with the children especially in mind have been failures and a drug on their hands. With me, many of the pictures which have been particularly mentioned as falling flat entirely when released have been a great success. Some of the pictures which I have heard were not well received by the public in general went fine with my children and drew packed houses and I have had requests to bring them back to run again.

I am always glad to co-operate with any charitable effort for children, with my special matinees and it very often happens that we can be mutually benefited in this way. For example, October 17 is tag day in St. Paul for the Anti-tuberculosis Society. To help create interest in this affair I have invited the thirty-five children who are now inmates of the institution which is to be benefited by tag day, to be my guests at the children's matinee which falls on October 14. This means more advertising for the taggers, puts a little special human appeal into the charity, and of course at the same time is good advertising for me. I will also give a certain per cent of my proceeds of that matinee to help the tag day fund.

I find that these special programs are great business-getters for the other shows at my house. They are of valuable assistance in getting the good-will of the mothers in the community and a fine means of advertising. I certainly am heartily in favor of the children's performances—that is in my own district. I cannot say as to how valuable they would be in all localities for this is my only experience with them. With me they have been very successful but I know a great many exhibitors have found them flat failures and have run them at a great loss.

Screen Club Plans Exposition and Ball

The Screen Club of Kansas City is laying plans for an extensive trade exposition and grand ball to be held some time in November. Three days will be devoted to the exposition. The first day will be merely one of inspection for the public, a small admission being charged, and souvenirs will be given away by the various distributing companies. The second day will see the selection of the queen of the ball and registering of the winners of the various popularity contests. A tour of the city will be given to visiting exhibitors and the prize winners. The grand ball will be held on the third night. It is estimated that with extensive advertising and a parade in the morning of the third day 15,000 people at the least will attend the ball.

Every exchange man in Kansas City has promised to secure one star and these, with the members of the Pageant and Overland Park Stock Company players, will assure a large gathering of stars.

It is very likely that exclusive permits will be issued where there are several theaters in a town. Therefore, exhibitors who are interested should immediately communicate with the secretary of the Screen Club.

Vitagraph Stars Tour Theaters

Lucille Lee Stewart, the Vitagraph star, Ralph W. Ince, producer, and Huntly Gordon, leading man, have just returned to New York from a very successful trip through the West and Canada.

In Montreal, Mr. Gordon's native city, where his parents live, they were tendered an enthusiastic greeting and Mr. Gordon, called upon to make a speech when he appeared at the Imperial Theater, modestly passed his honors on to Miss Stewart.

Miss Stewart made a gracious little speech and sang "Somewhere a Voice Is Calling," in her lovely soprano voice. Ralph W. Ince followed with a talk on the qualifications that go to the making of a successful motion picture player. After leaving Montreal the party went on to Glacier, British Columbia. The next stops were in Vancouver and Victoria and Seattle, where they expected to stay twenty-four hours and make one appearance only at the Clemmer Theater.

Their reception at this house was so flattering the management persuaded them to remain over another day, which was drawn out to a week, the demand to see the trio being so great. Clear up to the time of their last appearance at the Clemmer hundreds were turned away and only the desire to reach southern California, where Mr. Ince's mother lives, caused them to curtail their visit. Owing to a previous promise made the manager to appear once at the Portela Theater in San Francisco.

A few days were spent in southern California, when the party started homeward, to commence work in another large production Mr. Ince is to direct.

Florence Turner In "Redeemed"

In "Redeemed," the forthcoming Mutual Star production, Florence Turner, "the Bernhardt of the Screen," has a thoroughly suitable vehicle for the display of her talents as an emotional actress. As "Marea," the little Italian girl adrift in London, she is at her best.

Under the direction of the famous Larry Trimble, "Redeemed" has the finished quality which characterizes all of the Turner films. Scenes taken in the burning Adelphi Theater with a panic-stricken mob trying to escape through blocked doors is perhaps the most sensational thing of its sort ever done.

"Redeemed" has a wonderful background—London in all its teeming bustle of humanity. Mr. Trimble has made the best use of the color of his settings, as he always does, and "Redeemed" is worthily set.

Universal Director Henry McRae has completed "The Hand in the Dark."

One Monday Louis Chaudet, director of the Nestor comedians, started "Who's Who" and finished it Tuesday afternoon.

Unique Presentation Brings Big Business

Special to Motography from the Liberty Theater, Seattle, Washington.

WILLIAM S. HART'S "The Dawnmaker" was the latest Triangle-Ince feature staged by J. G. von Herberg of the Liberty Theater in Seattle. Every time a Hart feature is booked us we mark the days in red ink on our booking sheet and then get busy—for we are always sure of big business. Not only is Hart a big favorite here, but the photoplay fans know that a Hart picture is a good feature—a combination of star, story and staging that spells entertainment par excellence.

After a private showing of "The Dawnmaker" Mr. von Herberg decided that the central theme—the point on which our advertising, staging and music would revolve was the Northland—that cold vast region where romance goes hand in hand with adventure—where man rules and loves by right of primal might.

Gordon F. Fullerton, our advertising manager, built his cuts to carry this theme, and emphasized Hart's face and name. In the background of a rising sun was Hart dressed as an Indian—set into the sun's rays was the title of the play "The Dawnmaker" while into the dark sky above was set Hart's name in white letters. At the bottom of the ad was a horizon of snow covered evergreen trees into the solid portion of which was worked the theater's name "Liberty" in snow covered rustic letters. We have enclosed the ad and a copy of the window card created for this presentation. Our billboards and window cards, covered the city highways and business section, while framed photos of Hart, and framed scenes of the play were placed in the windows of the big business houses of Seattle's "Broadway"—Second avenue. Large ads were placed in the photoplay sections of the Seattle Sunday Times and Saturday Evening Star. The result was capacity business all day Sunday with the crowds extending into the streets and the business prevailed from early afternoon on until the last show at night, with capacity houses each of the following afternoons and standing room only at night.

Lobby Made an Evergreen Shelter

To create atmosphere for the feature the inside lobby was turned into a bower or cave of evergreen, the walls, ceiling and lights all being hidden by the sweet smelling aromatic pine, spruce and fir with a dash of color lent by autumn leaves which formed a large part of the ceiling decoration.

An Indian maid was the cashier and Indian maids were the ushers. The costumes were rented from a local costumer, but to lend the necessary touch of realism, real Indian headpieces of wampum—(beads) and real eagle feathers formed the headpiece. The girls' hair was parted in the middle—Indian style with a braid hanging down either shoulder. We were fortunate in being able to secure the genuine Indian wampum and eagle feathers from a local branch of the Hudson Bay Fur Company.

The introductory music and lighting effects in the theater itself were the most difficult problems, for it was decided that not only should this heighten the dramatic effect of Hart's "Dawnmaker" and serve as an introduction but they must be distinctive and entirely different from anything we had ever done before and should set a standard that none of our competitors could copy.

Surprising the Audience by Music and Lights

It is the unusual, the startling that gets attention, and the beautiful that will hold it was the supposition

The splendid decorative work done by the Liberty of Seattle in presenting "The Dawnmaker." Did you ever see a lobby like the one on the left? It lured thousands. On the right are the ushers, adorned with real wampum and eagle feathers. The cashier was similarly garbed.

Mr. Von Herberg based his atmospheric effects for the "Dawnmaker." As the Liberty is unusually well lighted and our giant $35,000 Wurlitzer Unit Orchestra is always on the job, we reversed the established order and electrified our audience by the different, the startling. Gradually we darkened the house. Starting from the top and back of the theater, one by one the lights flashed out and absolute silence prevailed, (the ushers seated nobody while the feature was opening). As the last light flashed out in the front, a low violin and cello combination was started on the unit orchestra, accented with the slow solemn boom of chimes, one at a time, as if one had awakened in the dark and the grandfather clock had tolled the hour.

By this time, in the two lighting boxes at either side of the curtain was a dim bluish light gradually lightening to grey and then a rosy dawn revealing distant snow capped peaks, the sky streaked with the rays of the rising sun, while in the foreground were foothills covered with snow laden evergreen. As the colors changed from dim blue to grey and pink, the music suggested the hum and undertone of wild life astir at dawn, the awakening songs of birds, dropping again to dead silence as the title "William S. Hart's "The Dawnmaker," was flashed onto our curtain only to take up the musical interpretation of the picture as the first scene of the play was framed by the opening curain, and our audience was into the play.

Round after round of applause greeted the effect which has been the talk of all Seattle since we have opened the picture. The whole test of the staging, atmospheric effects, costuming of the ushers, lobby decorations, etc., was the business we did which was stated in the first part of this story. Our theater was packed all day Sunday with the crowds extending into the street in the afternoons and evening, and capacity houses each of the following three afternoons with S. R. O. the following three evenings. When considering that the Liberty is a 2,200 capacity house with heavy competition this is all the more remarkable.

Houses Must Ventilate

Only 11 per cent of the amusement places in Detroit, chiefly moving picture theaters, were properly ventilated a year ago when an investigation was conducted by the health officer and sanitation engineer, according to a Detroit newspaper.

The data was gathered to assist the department in framing an amendment to the ordinance regulating the operation of amusement places. The present ordinance gives control of amusement places to the building, police and fire departments, but does not permit health regulation.

At the time of the survey there were 136 amusement places. Forty-seven per cent were unventilated. Thirty-two per cent had exhaust fans and 10 per cent had air supply fans, showing 89 per cent of the places to be in need of regulation in the interest of public health. The air supply in almost all places was found to be low. The average was two cubic feet per person for each minute. The amendment calls for 20 cubic feet per minute for each person.

"We feel," said the health officer, "that better results could be obtained by fixing the ordinance so that the health department would have something to do about the regulation of amusement places, than by bringing a lot of people into court under the sanitation rules."

Want Operators to Be Majors

An ordinance has been introduced into the meeting of the City Commissioners of Paducah, Kentucky, requiring that operators of moving picture machines be twenty-one years old.

The ordinance has the backing of the city electric inspector and of the union operators, who claim that its passage would follow similar regulations in other cities, and would be for the protection of the public generally.

Some opposition to it developed among the managers of the picture houses, whose position is that it is unnecessary, inasmuch as all the operators are union men who are 21 years old, this being a requirement of the union, but that they are obliged to have apprentice operators to relieve the regular men for meals, etc., and that they cannot always have apprentices who are of age.

The question will be fought out at the next meeting of the commissioners.

Penny Seats at Picture Show

Donaldson's store of Minneapolis was besieged recently by buyers for the penny seats to the Shubert Theater to see "Civilization."

Through the generosity of L. S. Donaldson any purchaser of a regular seat could buy the one next to it for one cent.

Minneapolis liked the idea and the sale of seats was fast. After 1 o'clock and at closing time at night, seats unsold are taken to the Shubert box office, and the penny plan prevails there.

The rush continued all one week, for Mr. Donaldson bought the entire theater capacity for that week

"The Voice of Love," a five-act drama featuring Winnifred Greenwood, will shortly be announced in the list of Mutual attractions.

The Mutual exchange at El Paso, Texas, has moved into larger quarters. J. E. Madson is the branch manager.

Waste Paper on the Exhibitor's Desk

AN exhibitor whom we know well as a man of sound business sense tells us that he has just sold thirty-two dollars' worth of waste paper. We comment not merely to praise our friend's thrift, but because the waste paper consisted of material that the United States mails had deposited at his door during a period of some months. And most of this mail that he so summarily disposed of had never been opened!

A man who has nothing else to do with his time can read a considerable amount of advertising literature in the course of a week. A man who spends a reasonable part of the week in productive labor can still do quite a bit of reading if he is so disposed. But a motion picture theater man, if he gives a maximum of attention to his house, finds himself forced to confine his reading to the necessary trade information and what little he may do for recreation.

It may be stated, we think, as an obvious truth that no exhibitor with a busy theater could find time to read all the advertising literature of the film producers, if it were all sent to his desk every week. We question if the average exhibitor could, if he would, take the time necessary to read twenty per cent of the total amount. And that practically the entire output of film manufacturers' literature is addressed to a great many theater men is, we think, more than probable. While the man who could get thirty-two dollars for a bale of this stuff (unopened) might not frown upon the practice of sending it to him, it is likely that the majority of its recipients get nothing out of it but annoyance and a stuffed waste basket.

It is easy to argue that a house-organ may be made so attractive that the exhibitor will be forced to read it; but that argument is lost upon the man who never opens the package to see if its contents are attractive or not. And he cannot take time to open it, because there are twenty or thirty or fifty similar packages. Their sheer quantity appals him. The waste basket is the only way out.

All this points to an extraordinary waste. It is a waste the more disturbing in that the stuff deserves better treatment; it is really too good to be thrown away with the original wrapper still upon it. Its production costs lots of money and lots of ingenuity. But it isn't the wasted cost that hurts so much as the fact that it never reaches the readers it is intended for; and it fails, as it were, by sheer force of numbers.

This is not intended as a preachment against house organs, though we hold to the traditional publisher's opinion of those private trade papers. We cannot question that the exhibitor would read with interest a single house organ, or maybe two or three of them, unless they were too voluminous. We believe the legitimate trade paper has the advantage always, because its reader can find all he wants under one cover, and need not make mental discounts for self-interested and biased descriptions. The trade paper will be read and preserved; a single house organ would be read before it was destroyed; a multiplicity of house organs merely guarantees that none of them will be read, and that all will be thrown away.

It is a pity, economically and otherwise, that some of these really brilliant examples of house editing cannot be combined to make a smaller total and a surer welcome. If every producer whose publicity department took pride in the quality and quantity of its work would stop to contemplate the fact that every other producer's publicity department is doing the same thing, there might be an effort to systematize the schedule of literature.

If the curtailing of house organ effort were merely for economy, it would not be worth while to consider it. But it is not a question of saving money; it is a question of getting anywhere at all with the work. Even the men who depend upon the editing of house organs for their livelihood cannot relish the thought that the products of their genius are being constantly lost in the shuffle. Human capacity for the absorption of printer's ink is limited, and concentration seems necessary if the manufacturers' literature is to reach its goal.

Politics and Censorship

BECAUSE of the movement to establish a federal censorship commission, and the importance of the censorship problem generally, this season of political activity has brought the candidates for high office face to face with a new question. The aspirant for political honors is beginning to realize that there may be considerable potency in the answer he makes to the query, "What is your attitude on censorship?" Even the old and familiar demands that seek to commit the embarrassed candidate to a definite position on suffrage, the liquor question and so forth have less significance because they have less effective machinery for gaining the public eye. And then the film industry's interrogations carry all the mystery of a new power. Who in public office, or traveling in that direction, is confident that he has the measure of its consequence?

When Governor Hughes was nominated for the presidency, MOTOGRAPHY made an immediate effort to obtain his views on the censorship question. The candidate's answer was, of course, non-committal, as was to be expected. The inquiry accomplished its purpose by establishing the importance of the subject and preparing the ground for cultivation.

On October 3, a committee of prominent film men from the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry waited upon President Wilson at Shadow Lawn to ascertain his views on censorship. The interview was as satisfactory as could have been anticipated: for while Mr. Wilson took no definite stand upon the subject, he indicated a logical frame of mind toward it.

A week later, a similar group of motion picture men visited Mr. Hughes at West Orange and invited him to express himself as to whether censorship is right or wrong. However carefully the Republican candidate refrained from handing down a decision against the censorial principle, the attitude he revealed on the federal commission question was very encouraging to the opponents of that proposition. His position, in short, was that to be expected of any man of broad reasoning power; and we cannot construe that as other than unfavorable to the whole code of censorship.

Lest the presidential candidates should have any grounds for pleading lack of information, the National Board of Review has been bombarding them with statements of fact and logic about the censorship principle, as well as evidence that a national censorship would not operate to remove the irritation of a multiplicity of local censor boards.

The head of the federal government, of course, is concerned only with national laws and conditions. But unless a national censorship law make local censorship unnecessary, the national law itself must be regarded as useless and burdensome. However logical the theory that federal censorship will not eliminate state and municipal censorship: however strongly it is urged that local censor boards would have no further function when the federal government had taken over their task; in spite of those very good arguments, the state and the city and village authorities already decline, in no uncertain terms, to be deprived of the "right" of judging their own affairs, and they will always regard the picture shows within their boundaries as their own private affairs, utterly regardless of the fact that the same pictures may be showing in every community in the country.

The question is a vital one to the motion picture industry. It is particularly portentous just now because there lies in the political situation an opportunity to settle it, one way or the other, for a long time to come—possibly for all time. For the success of the industry in throwing off its incubus now will establish its power to control its own destinies through each succeeding campaign.

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

THOUSANDS of Italians crowded into the Waverly Theater, at Halsted and Harrison streets, Chicago, to see the special show run as a benefit for the Italian Red Cross on Colmbus Day, October 12. Manager George Hoffman turned over 33 per cent of the gross proceeds to the fund.

Every vaudeville house in Philadelphia, with the exception of two, has booked Pathe's new serial, "The Shielding Shadow."

Greenberg's Majestic Theater, Peoria, Illinois, was destroyed by fire last week and an estimated loss of $150,000 was sustained.

The Minnesota Metro Pictures Service has opened a branch office in Milwaukee, Wisconsin. E. H. Hoyt is in charge of the Milwaukee office and is assisted by Frank de Lorenzo.

The Evening Republican of Red Wing, Minnesota, got out a special edition in connection with "Civilization," which was showing at a Red Wing theater, and gave the war spectacle a great send off.

The Majestic Gardens of Grand Rapids is one of the finest photoplay theaters in Michigan. It has been reopened recently with David Kline as manager. Paramount, Fox and Metro pictures are run.

"Safety first. More exits, wider aisles, wider and more comfortable seats and better ventilation than the law requires," is the slogan printed on the front of the neat program issued by the Biograph Theater, Chicago.

The Vitagraph Company is mailing a very classy letter to all exhibitors announcing the twelve-reel episode "The Scarlet Runner." The envelope and letterhead are both of bright scarlet and are very attractive.

Billy Mick, manager of the Lyric Theater, Minneapolis, which is owned by Elliott-Sherman, has gone back to the old ten-cent policy. The first offering under the new plan was the Selig feature, "The Country God Forgot."

The New York Giants, well known in the field of baseball, attended a performance at the Rialto Theater in New York last week. The special feature offered by the management was Claire Niles in her noted "baseball dance."

Frank Cook, manager of the Saxe's Princess Theater, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, received some rather serious injuries when he plunged through a hole in the floor of the theater to the basement. He is under the doctor's care.

The Laemmle Film Service of Minneapolis recently received a letter which was addressed to the postmaster at Minneapolis addressed as follows: "Please deliver to a company who handle motion picture films, machines and supplies."

The Lyric Theater, New York City, will be dark next week, owing to preparations for the showing there on October 16 of William Fox's film spectacle, "A Daughter of the Gods." John Zandt will be in charge of the theater for Mr. Fox.

Eleven additional complaints against proprietors of motion picture shows have been filed in the County court at Fort Worth, Texas, bringing the total now on the court docket to nearly one hundred. Three of the cases have been tried, resulting in convictions in two cases.

Jones, Linick and Schaefer estimate that something over 412,000 people have viewed "Where Are My Children?" at the La Salle Opera House, Chicago, during the ten weeks it has run up to date. It is expected that the feature will continue till the first of the year.

The Australian Federated Showmen's Association has decided to raise the present theater prices. Their object is to cut out the threepenny price altogether, leaving the prices as follows: Day "sessions"—dress circle, one shilling (24 cents), and "stalls," sixpence (12 cents).

The downtown Chicago picture houses' program for the week include the opening of "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea" at the Studebaker; the eleventh week of "Where Are My Children?" at the La Salle; "The Birth of a Nation" at the Colonial, and "The Combat" at the Ziegfeld.

Work is progressing rapidly on Chicago's newest playhouse, the Rialto, which is now being constructed on State street near Van Buren street. The house will seat 1,800 and will represent a value of land and theater totaling $2,000,000. The house will be under Jones, Linick and Schaefer management.

The Seattle Star has inaugurated a photoplay department, due to the efforts of C. F. Hill, publicity director of the Progressive Motion Picture Company. This is another example of the fact that newspapers will co-operate with the picture industry if they are approached in the right manner.

The "pay in advance" system for films has been installed by the exchanges in Ontario, Canada. This was done without trouble or confusion and the plan is working out to the satisfaction of both the distributors and exhibitors. The same method of rental also is in vogue in other large Canadian cities.

The first community moving picture and community singing entertainment for the present school year will be held in the Lincoln school, West Allis, Wisconsin. These entertainments were given from December to June last year and were attended by more than 10,000 persons. A very small fee is charged to pay expenses.

A. H. Blank, proprietor of the Garden Theater and the Garden Feature Film Company of Des Moines, has organized a $75,000 corporation to be known as the Mid-West Photoplay Company. This company will have exclusive control for Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri of film productions, among them being the Clara Kimball Young productions.

Motion pictures showing the entire course of instruction given Philadelphia's firemen at the Municipal Fire School were exhibited at various motion picture theaters of that city the first week in October. The pictures were made through the courtesy of Stantley V. Mastbaum, of the Stanley Company, and have the endorsement of Mayor Smith and William H. Wilsom, director of the Department of Public Safety.

The Union Theaters, Ltd., of Sydney, Australia, had an excellent and novel advertisement for the Mutual-Chaplin film "The Fireman." The idea emanated from the brain of the chief of the department, C. L. Yearsley, and was in the form of huge mechanical figures representing Charles Chaplin and Edna Purviance, along with an electric bell which rang automatically, thus attracting good business.

George E. Schmidt has been appointed manager for the Alamo No. 2 Theater in Atlanta, Georgia. Mr. Schmidt formerly managed the Prince Theater, at Jacksonville, Florida, and the Strand Theater at Spartansburg, South Carolina, and is one of the best known theater managers in the South, having had a very successful career in theater management in a number of southern cities. Mr. Schmidt has been featuring Paramount pictures.

If an exhibitor can make his community feel that it has a sense of ownership in his house he has accomplished a big step toward success. Such a thing is being done by J. C. Smith, manager of the Comfort Theater of Sharpsburg, Pennsylvania. He is conducting a contest which will allow his patrons to choose the slogan for his house. This is bound to create patrons for his theater, for they will have invented their own advertising.

Organization of the Miami Valley Exhibitors' League, consisting of picture show proprietors, has been formed with D. H. Thompson as president and A. F. Kinzeler secretary. It is the purpose of the new association to promote the interests of the picture playhouses in whatever way this may be found possible. Twenty-five out of the 33 exhibitors in the city have identified themselves with the organization. The 25 members control 27 shows.

Here's the way Manager Jensen of the Lathrop Theater of Omaha, Nebraska, talks to his patrons in his programs:

"We give you a high-class entertainment; you can enjoy every minute of your visit to 'The Lathrop.' No, we haven't any canned music, but Miss Lillian Johnson can rattle the ivories on that Knabe in a way that will make your heart glad.

"Last week I called your particular attention to 'The Light at Dusk' and 'The Spoilers.' You heeded the call and were well repaid. On this program listen to Bushman, Hart, Petrova and Ethel Clayton. Yours very truly, W. O. Jensen."

At Ascher's Lakeside Theater on Sheridan road, Chicago, Manager Lamoreaux has installed a system by which patrons are loaned umbrellas. When it starts to rain, a slide to that effect is thrown on the screen and it is announced that the "rain-sticks" can be procured at the office. Another thoughtful piece of service is the following: When anyone enters the theater with a parcel large enough to be in the patron's way, one of the ushers relieves him of it and it is checked free.

"The Birth of a Nation" is now running in its fourth big return week at the Colonial, Chicago. The costumed girl ushers and the Colonial stage setting are practically the same as those used in every other presentation given the Griffith picture. There are 36 companies of 30 people each on the road at present presenting the drama in a standardized form in several countries. The managers still maintain that the picture will never be shown for less than one dollar top prices.

R. R. Russell, manager the Strand Theater, Evansville, Indiana, gave a five-day fashion show last week. Five of the large stores co-operated with Mr. Russell, who played to 17,139 paid admissions during the five days. $75,000 worth of gowns, jewelry, shoes and furniture were shown by 142 different young ladies, posing as models, and over 300 different gowns, suits and other apparel were shown. This is to be a permanent affair at the Strand, both spring and fall. Mr. Russell runs the Paramount program.

The Photoplay World Publishing Company of Chicago is issuing a neat little 16-page magazine called the Photoplay World. This is filled with live photoplay news and illustrations and is distributed to hundreds of exhibitors the country over. Each manager prints upon the back cover of each issue the name of his house and a week's program and gives the book away to patrons. This co-operative plan makes it possible to issue the magazine in large quantities at low cost and should prove to be a valuable asset in stirring up interest in photoplays in general and in the programs of local houses in particular.

A flag pole was erected by the piano when Exhibitor Runyon of Bigheart, Oklahoma, presented "The Battle Cry of Peace," his eleven-year-old son marched out on the stage at the head of six boys dressed as sailors and gave an opening address. At the climax of his "speech" the flag was run up the pole and a little Colonial-costumed girl entered, followed by six little girls in white. After singing "We'll Rally 'Round the Flag, Boys," the youngsters all marched to the back of the stage and parted the flags, disclosing a little boy as Uncle Sam and a little girl dressed as Columbia holding hands. Above them was a very small tot with a white dove. This presentation proved to be very popular and patrons went away with the feeling that they had been given more than their money's worth. Such good will is a very valuable asset to a house

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

THERE is a big city department store which uses for its slogan "Service First," and I often think when I see this what a good motto is would make for every motion picture exhibitor. The one word "service" really covers the whole success or lack of success of the motion picture theater. The word is very broad in its meaning and covers the whole running paraphernalia of the theater as well as the program, the attitude of the manager, the attendants, etc. If you ask any successful manager what is the keynote of his success, he will invariably answer "service." If you ask any "fan" why he patronizes a certain theater exclusively his answer will usually be "because they give me what I want."

One definition of the word service is "duty done." And the manager who can conscientiously say that he is giving the best service possible in all particulars of his house can have a very righteous and satisfied feeling that he is doing his duty toward his patrons, his house and himself.

Are you giving the very best service of which you are capable, or have you grown rather neglectful of many little things which it is your duty to perform? Can you truthfully say that you are living up to the standard set by the motto "Service First?"

78—My new house is just about completed and I am most enthusiastic about it. It seats 1,500 and is in an exclusive residential district where I believe I am going to be able to get the patronage of the very nicest kind of people. I know that my first move is going to be the most important of all and I do want to have everything just as it should be and in the best style so as to attract the class of people to whom I want to cater. What do you think would be a good plan for an opening? I want something out of the ordinary and something that will be just fine in every way, attract the attention of the whole neighborhood and make the people talk.

I admire your foresight in realizing that the first move made in the launching of a new theater is a very important one, and that if you want to cater only to the best class of people you have to start out with that patronage and not try to take any one at first and then attempt to raise the standard of your house later on. It is always easier to start right than it is to change to the right method after a theater has established its policy. It used to be very hard to get the better class of people into the motion picture theaters but now they are regular patrons and there is no reason why the motion picture theater cannot be kept just as high class as any other form of entertainment.

If you want the first night to be very exclusive and unusual why don't you have a real opening—that is, issue invitations and have the admittance by cards only— refusing any paid admissions offered on that night? Get up a genuine according-to-form invitation requesting the honor of their presence at the opening performance, give your entire program of both pictures and music, and ask that the invitation be presented at the door as admission is to be by card only. This will make it appear like quite a social affair to all receiving the invitations and make them more liable to attend. Do not issue these invitations too far ahead of the opening or the people are liable to forget it. Let them arrive at the homes the day before or not more than two days before the event. It would be well to have a special musical program for the evening, a good orchestra and a singer. If you have an organ in your house engage a good organist, someone whose name is pretty well known and liked in the neighborhood, give some selections during the evening. On your invitation state just what your program is going to be for there may be a number of people who do not care for the pictures but will be enticed into the theater the first night on account of the music offered. Of course there is no need to impress upon you the fact that the film shown must be one of the best and one that will appeal to all. You are primarily a picture house, you know, and you want your first sample program to be a forerunner of the kind of entertainment the people will receive in your house. You will need to spend a good deal of time and thought on this. Do not make it too elaborate for you have the extra musical program and do not need so much. I would advise having the same kind of program you intend showing each night—just the same number of subjects and the same class, so that the people can judge what they will see hereafter in your house.

Be sure to have some printed programs of the first week's entertainment handed out to each guest as they enter and in that program it would be well to state that the picture program you are offering for the evening is just the same as will be given every night in your theater. It would be a good idea to make these in the form of souvenir programs of some sort so the audience will be sure to take them home and save them and so be reminded of your offerings for the first week.

In sending out your invitations compile the list very carefully and be sure you are inviting just the people you desire for regular patronss. Do not confine yourself to your immediate neighborhood but reach out to the best people in the adjoining communities from which your theater is easy of access by machine or street car. Take into consideration the fact that there will be a great many people who will not accept your invitation and send out enough to insure a filled house. It might be a good scheme to have each invitation good for the bearer and party so that only one invitation need be sent to a family and in this way you might also get in some people whom you had overlooked.

79—Do you think that these contests of different kinds pay in a small town? A man in an adjoining town to ours ran one where he gave away tickets to the theater for the best poem on the picture or something like that, and some of the people that come to my theater heard of it and wanted to know why I didn't do something like that. I don't know whether it is worth while or not.

I imagine you will find a contest of this kind very much worth while in a small town. The people have not much to interest them and it would be very fine advertising for your theater and probably bring you a great deal of added patronage; also, this might be a great help to you in finding out just what kind of films to choose to best please your patrons.

Why don't you try having them send in articles of not more than five hundred words telling which pictures shown at your theater between certain dates they liked best and why. Make these dates about two or three weeks apart and you will be able to draw full houses during that time if the people are at all interested. Offer a season pass to your theater or a number of passes for a shorter time, or cash prizes if you prefer, for the best article received. You might get some of the local merchants to donate prizes as this would be good advertising for them also. I think in running a contest of this sort the surest way of interesting the greatest number of people is to have not a few valuable prizes but that same value spread over a greater number of smaller offerings. If there are just two prizes offered the people are liable to feel that there is not much use trying because there will be so many people competing and so few that can really get anything, while with a number of smaller prizes they will feel that they might get one anyway.

It would be a good advertising scheme for you, and also please the winners very much, I believe, if you would try to interest the town paper in the matter to the extent that they would publish the prize-winning articles, or at least the two or three best ones.

It might be also that that you could get the public schools to co-operate with you by showing some educational picture and then perhaps the essays which the boys and girls presented at the theater could be written in the English class at school and the pupils receive credit for them in the class so they would feel they were getting something out of it anyway, even if they did not win a prize.

If you find that this idea is popular and does increase your box office receipts you might start a series of small contests. For example, each week you could give prizes for articles written. These might be on ways to improve your house. They might be on the actor or actress the writer liked best or something of that kind. It would be a good idea to vary these and create more interest by allowing only people in a certain section of the town to compete that week. Or you might confine it to the married ladies one week, or to the high school pupils, or the pupils in the grades, and so make each week's contest different enough to keep up the interest and at the same time bring you the added benefit of the free advertising and larger patronage which would result. Have the announcement of the winners made from the screen or from the platform one night in the week—and choose for this the evening when your business is usually the poorest, so that you will be able to increase your audience on that occasion, for naturally everyone will be curious to see who is the winner for the week and be watching for their own name to be flashed on the screen.

80—There seems to be quite a spirit among the people coming to my house lately that they want to see some of the motion picture stars themselves and I have had a good many people ask me lately if I could not arrange to have some of them come to the theater some time so they could see how they looked in real life. They have said they would be willing to pay fifty cents on that night if they could really see some of their favorite actors and actresses. I guess the reason they have this bug is that we are not very far from a number of the eastern studios and I suppose they hear so many little personal things about the players and think they have nothing to do but run around from one theater to another to let the people look at them. How would you go about this to see if you could get some of the stars to appear?

It is a perfectly natural desire on the part of your audience to want to become personally acquainted with the actors and actresses they enjoy so much on the screen, and as you are situated so near the studios it is possible that this could be arranged. You must take into consideration, however, the fact that you are probably only one of hundreds of exhibitors who are making the same request of the film companies and while they might be willing that the players should appear in your theater which is situated near the studio in so doing they are starting a precedent and there is no reason why if they grant you this privilege that every other exhibitor should not feel that he is entitled to the same favor. Also some of the players feel that it detracts rather than adds to their popularity to make personal appearances, and others dread a public appearance very much.

You can write either to the stars themselves or the publicity manager of the company with which they are connected and state the date on which you are going to run some big feature in which one of their stars takes the lead, or are going to start one of their serials, and how much you believe it would help your business as well as advertise the star and the company, to have the player appear at the house on that night, and they may co-operate with you in this matter.

If the star the people particularly desire to see happens to be so busy at that time that it is impossible to be away from the studio it is possible that they would let you know when some of the actors happened to be passing through your city and you could secure them for an appearance at that time. The various studios have different rules regarding this matter and the only way to tell what you can get is to write and ask the favor. Be assured that they will treat you with every courtesy, although they do have to refuse your request for some reason.

Effective Advertising to Exhibitors

Exhibitors of the north central west have been receiving a piece of mail that made them "sit up and take notice." It came from William A. Lochren, who issued it from his Minneapolis Film Exchange to advertise the feature, "Dante's Inferno." It was a clever idea and Mr. Lochren here tells about it in his own words:

We wanted to tell our story through the mail to the theater men in such a form that they would be compelled to read it through. We found the ordinary flash circulars and form letters less than 1 per cent efficient.

In marketing the new edition of "Dante's Inferno," we tried a different scheme. We had tiny envelopes and letterheads printed on bond paper to look as nearly as possible like personal stationery. On the first page is a typewritten note, brief, mystifying and faintly humorous, beginning, "Speaking of Hell." On the third page is a red and black cartoon of a devil pitchforking crowds of people into a theater entryway, with an enlightening legend, "All Exhibitors Say Dante's Devil Does It." On a loose inserted page we got down to business and told our story. These diminutive notes were addressed in feminine handwriting and sent to every exhibitor in Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North and South Dakota. In conjunction with the letters we laid out a liberal and sustained advertising campaign in the trade papers.

The results were astonishing. Where ordinary circularizing was as a rule less than 1 per cent effective, these dainty and deceptive little notes were nearly 10 per cent efficient, and answers are still coming, in every mail. They cost about twice as much as circulars, but the returns were ten times as great. Certainly that's good business.

It was in one of those so-called barber shops inconveniently near the Fort Lee studios.

Walter Law, the William Fox actor, was the victim. It had been decided upon short notice that some of the Medusa-like locks of Mr. Law should be sacrificed to the needs of a new picture. After twenty minutes of monologue and little action on the hair, the barber said:

"Your hair is getting very gray, sir."

"I'm not surprised," Law retorted. "Hurry up."

Glen White swears it's true.

The Photoplay Scenario

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT

Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

Note—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of Motography, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

Naming Characters Is Fine Art

By Gilson Willets,

Staff writer, the Selig Polyscope Company.

IN this article let us turn our attention to little details that are very frequently overlooked by experienced writers of photoplays. For example, there is the naming of characters. There is art in the naming of characters. The name Mike O'Connor would not fit a gentleman of the old school but the name might be the very thing for the young Irishman who is trying to advance himself and gain fame and fortune. There is a certain knack in trying to have the name of a character carry along the idea of what that character is intended to be. Montmorency Delancy would not do for a ward heeler's cognomen but the name might be suitable for a fashionable fop.

And then the art of writing subtitles is very, very important. I notice that there is an inclination on the part of some film companies to favor the fancy subtitles, in other words, fine writing. In subtitles as in other reading matter, a plain clear text is preferable. Say what is to be said as briefly as possible with clarity.

Have you the habit of observation? If you have not, do not try to write motion picture stories. Newspaper training, for example, fosters the habit of observation. If you can see what is transpiring around you; if you can see the unusual situations that regularly occur and if you can put these situations down on paper, you should sooner or later write motion picture plots.

And do not stray too far afield for your movie stories. Too frequently the beginner will seek for situations in Africa; or in Alaska, or elsewhere, influenced by motion picture atmosphere he has enjoyed in the theaters. It makes little difference to these writers that they have never been in Africa or Alaska, they blithesomely dash off their stories and they wonder why the same are rejected.

Write of people and of places you know and your writing will be the more convincing. Leave the stories of distant places to those who are familiar with these localities. Maybe right at your own door lies the elusive plot which you have overlooked because of its close proximity.

The greatest talent is to perceive the stories that lie right before your eyes. To look underneath the surface of things right in your own locality and dig out facts and fancies that others, not so observant, have passed by.

What the Future May Hold

TO the photoplaywright who is really in the game to stay—the writer who has the ability and the perseverance to stick to the work through thick and thin, a little encouragement as to what the future may hold in store for them may be gained from the experience of two writers which came to my notice recently.

Roslyn D. Whytock is a reporter and special writer on the New York Evening World. He decided to break into the photoplay game and wrote and sent out exactly one hundred synopses before he sold one. Such perseverance merited a reward and he received it in that since then he has not been able to conceive ideas fast enough to supply the demand made upon him. Mr. Whytock's advice to the free lance writer is, "If at first you don't succeed, lay in a couple of tons of paper and keep after 'em."

John William Kellette, now an assistant director in the William Fox organization, is another man who holds a record for persistency in battering for admittance at the doors of the film companies. Once a week for a whole solid year he sent a script to a motion picture company before having one accepted. Since that time he has written and had accepted several hundred.

Have patience. Perhaps the end of your year of clamoring is almost ended and you will soon be admitted as a member of the fold.

How to Build

By W. H. Baugh

"START your story off with a punch or a heart interest centering around one or more of your central characters or events and then tell in the fewest words possible only the essentials. Quit when you're done and be sure your story is done when you quit." This was the advice given a cub reporter on a metropolitan newspaper several years ago and it was "pounded in" with such emphasis it has never been forgotten. Experience has proven the same advice good for the photoplaywright.

Not only is it true that "the story is the thing" but the author who visualizes the gripping story is the one who plunges right out into the middle, slowly, surely and reasonably leading back to the ordinary narrative opening, giving a clear insight and then working up to a pleasing though surprising climax that leaves the audience something they will carry around in their "think tank" awhile.

The free lance writer who is able to "put over" a story at this age when self-conceited directors lead themselves to believe their stories are meeting public demands, may consider himself fortunate. Recently a daily motion picture fan declared he could always tell stories written outside the studios because they had to be of unusual merit before many of the companies would buy. This we believe true to a certain extent though many of our best stories come from staff writers. They are not book adaptations however requiring twenty-five per cent of the footage for explanations, and they are not "padded" stories where one reel ideas are built into five reel "features."

Nine rejected scripts before connecting up with a $25 check for our first sale is not a record of which we are particularly proud and were it not for the fact that we have often been compelled to re-write a newspaper story the second or third time before it passed the critical judgment of an exacting editor, who slung our crumpled efforts into his waste basket with unprintable language, we would have no doubt given up discouraged.

The path of the average photoplaywright is not always strewn with flowers and bank checks as the misleading advertising of fake "schools" would lead thousands of disappointed "boobs" to believe, and we must admit were it not for the continual creative yearning within that all but compels to yield to the desire to couple up in story form the hundreds of fancied actions and personalities continually running through our "noodle" we would have quit long ago.

There are few amateurs who can use "the kale" to better purposes than "yours truly" but we can say with all sincerity that the impelling force to write, to create something in the story line that will uplift, impress, and entertain struggling humanity of the great common class, is the one thing that causes us to strive for success.

Take an ignorant miner, born and raised in the coal regions, to the thriving city; drop him down on an attractive corner building lot surrounded by building material; place in his possession a set of carpenter tools and ask him to immediately construct a modern, well planned residence that will bring a quick sale because of its attractiveness and arrangement; compare this individual to the ignorant, would-be-amateur scenario writer and you will be impressed with the similarity.

If not possessed of enough brains to realize his incompetency and become bewildered and walk away in despair the would-be builder, filled with the ego and conceit characterizing many "boob" writers will go to work with hammer and saw attempting to build without plans or specifications that of which he knows not. Deserving failure results.

It may be that this would-be builder at one time helped his father construct a cow shed down on the farm and later on worked as helper with real carpenters in constructing a well planned cottage. Thus he may have gained sufficient knowledge to enable him to do the "rough work" on a plain building of simple plan. Would this warrant his attempting to draw a set of original plans, conceiving all his own architectural design and then constructing with his own hands that modern home asked for? Certainly not!

It is just so with the amateur writer. If he has the natural ability, including a creative mind, plotting faculty, originality, visualization, etc., he will not set to work constructing a story that must eventually be torn down, like the miner-carpenter's building, for lack of plans and proper frame work; but instead, he will set to work studying the best authors and reading produced story synopses. Better yet, he will frequent the theaters and study closely while he watches intently the construction and unfolding of the successful plot, carefully noting its climax with a critical eye.

When he returns to that quiet, secluded study where his thoughts from a concentrated mind can work best he will start "building"; not with an idea to selling; not with the thought of the submission of a scenario and much less an acceptance, but only with the thought uppermost that some day he may build a modern "mansion," a masterpiece.

No acceptable building can possibly be constructed without proper plans, foundation and frame work and, fellow amateurs, listen to this warning, the lack of which cost me dollars in postage, months of anxiety and disappointment and many rejection slips: Study every recognized authority on plot construction, read every synopsis release in the trade journals; study stories on the screen; don't send out a script until you are satisfied with it in your own mind and then only to studios using that kind of material and above all work, work, work.

Cannot Copyright Scenarios

MANY inquiries have been received asking if there is any way the author can copyright his photoplay manuscript.

A writer cannot copyright a motion picture play manuscript as such. The production can be copyrighted after it is filmed, but the writer of an original plot cannot send a copy of that picture play plot to Washington and obtain copyright protection thereon. Attorney Frank B. Willis, now Governor of Ohio, introduced a measure in Congress several years ago asking for copyright protection to motion picture play plots, classifying them as "dramatic composition." Up to date this bill has been buried in committee and has never seen the light of day.

Legitimate motion picture manufacturers will not filch the plots submitted to them by authors and the agitation for copyright protection develops from the fact that some few obscure "wild-cat" companies have appropriated ideas found in submitted manuscripts.

Five Reel Scenarios Wanted

Do you know how to bake a loaf of bread? Do you know how to write a scenario? If you are versed in both of these arts you can sell a five-reeler—if it is very good.

The Woman's Association of Commerce has decided to have a five-reel film made of its home baking propaganda to be shown in different cities where home baking clubs would be organized, in an attempt to cut down the high cost of living and to combat the increased price in bread.

The picture will be taken in the home baking school in the Schiller Building, Chicago, and a five-reel scenario worked around this activity is desired, but it must be a good one.

The scenarios may be sent to Miss Florence King, 1613 Monadnock Block, Chicago, Illinois, president of the Woman's Association of Commerce, and more definite information as to the price to be paid for this scenario and the conditions, may be obtained from her.

In the cast with Richard Bennett in the Mutual Star production in which he is now working, "The Highest Good," are both his wife, Adrienne Morrison, and his sister, Miss Blanche Hanson.

Mr. and Mrs. Bennett and their two little daughters will return to New York, October 14, but Miss Hanson will remain at the American studios as a member of the stock company and will appear in other Mutual features.

Theda Bara in "Romeo and Juliet"

WILLIAM FOX ANNOUNCES SUPERB PICTURIZATION OF SHAKESPEAR'S TRAGEDY

NEITHER time nor money have been spared in the picturization of "Romeo and Juliet" in the William Fox Studio. Theda Bara will enact the role of the Juliet and thousands of dollars have been spent to insure absolute accuracy in details as well as in essentials.

The settings throughout are entirely worthy of the production. Among those particularly attractive are the fateful masquerade ball, the beautiful balcony scene, and the streets of the city of Verona.

The story has not been sacrificed in any attempt to obtain extra film footage. It was decided that five reels would make the most effective screen version of "Romeo and Juliet," and only five reels were taken. Acting, direction, scenario, photography, film cutting—everything in connection with the picture was placed in charge of experts.

Harry Hilliard will play the Romeo to Miss Bara's Juliet. A strong cast has been chosen to support them, including Glen White, Walter Law, John Webb Dillion, Einar Linden, Elwin Eaton, Edwin Holt, Alice Gale, Victory Bateman and Helen Tracy.

Glen White, Walter Law and John Webb Dillion have acted in many of William Fox's recent releases. Einar Linden will be recalled for his splendid performance as Don Jose in the Fox picturization of "Carmen." Mr. Linden also had prominent parts in "The Eternal Sapho" and "The Family Stain." Alice Gail has a record of thirty years' success on the stage; for several seasons she acted the Nurse in the legitimate. She also appeared in "Sins of Men."

The others in the cast have been in moving pictures for years.

Jane and Katherine Lee will not be missed from the production. These two children have the parts of pages.

The name of J. Gordon Edwards, who has made most of the Bara photoplays, guarantees the excellence of the direction.

One of these bright lights is June Fox Caprice.

Juliet a Victim of Lack of Eugenics

If eugenics had been the fashion in Verona in the sixteenth century, Shakespeare could never have written his 'Romeo and Juliet,' Theda Bara said last week during a discussion about the masterpiece which William Fox has just put into moving pictures.

The distinguished actress is herself a firm believer in the science of eugenics and she advances a convincing argument to support her novel contention.

In studying the role of Shakespeare's unhappy heroine before she began to portray the character Miss Bara came to this conclusion:

"Juliet's heartbreaking time resulted simply from her parents being illy mated.

"Juliet's father was sixty years old, or more, while her mother was probably twenty-eight, and certainly not more than thirty. These facts are established very easily.

"With all this for a background, it is little wonder that Juliet scarcely stops to apply the test of reason to that which her passions dictate.

"She is a tragic figure because the marriage of her parents was wrong."

Cigarette Box Forces Retake

Because a modern cigarette box with the name printed in type an inch high was dropped on the ground and passed over unnoticed two hundred feet of the funeral procession in Romeo and Juliet had to be retaken. They didn't make that brand of cigarettes in Verona in 1594.

De Vere Returns to Fox Forces

Harry T. De Vere, who has acted in four previous productions for William Fox, is again with Fox photoplays, and will be seen in a forthcoming release.

Mr. De Vere made a stage debut at the age of five, when he played in "Peak," with the famous Fanny Davenport. Thirteen years later, he again acted with Miss Davenport's company in "Cleopatra." He also appeared in support of Mrs. Fiske, Richard Mansfield and Olga Nethersole.

In the silent drama, Mr. De Vere has had extensive experience. After doing pictures for various concerns, he joined the William Fox forces, and acted in "Battle of Hearts," "The End of the Trail," "The Man from Bitter Roots" and "The Beast."

Reinhard Engaged for Caprice Picture

John Reinhard, the well-known motion picture man who has been engaged to play the "heavy" in June Caprice's new picture for William Fox, has a real ambition.

Mr. Reinhard, it should be stated first, is to act the part of a sculptor villain.

Cleveland Exhibitors Meet

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Cleveland, at its last weekly meeting, considered a letter from the Democratic Association, asking for a list of names of members, and volunteering to assist the league against censorship. Not understanding the obligations imposed by submitting such a list, no action on the matter was taken.

A discussion was widely entered into in regard to the formation of some plan to strengthen the local organization. Ben Sawyer, president of the league, proposed the plan which was adopted. He moved that a committee be appointed to divide the city in sections, call on each exhibitor in the districts and discover his disposition in regard to the league. This action will force the exhibitor to declare himself either for or against the league. It is hoped that the membership will be materially increased by these measures. The committee, consisting of F. E. Simmons, D. L. Schumann, A. Mahrer, Benjamin Sawyer, William Slimm, J. J. Mellert and Henry Lustig, will divide the city into districts and to apportion the exhibitors to the committeemen.

The following card was passed among members of the league:

To Our Friends and Patrons:

The operator, A. E. Mahen, of the Lucier theater is a licensed operator and has a financial interest in the theater. Another operator could not give you the picture service you have been getting.

Our equipment is of the finest type so we could not afford to employ cheap labor.

The Lucier Theater Amusement Co.

The Lucier Theater has been picked by fourteen men. Sam Bullock made a motion which was seconded, that the league tender its sympathy and moral support to Mr. Mahen, and that it stand ready to offer financial and if necessary to assist Mr. Mahen in his fight against the operator's union.

The Dudley Company Producing

M. B. Dudley, president and general manager of the Dudley Motion Picture Manufacturing Company, has made arrangements with the Unity Sales Corporation to release the features produced by his company.

The Dudley Motion Picture Manufacturing Company is a newly formed organization and will specialize in Western dramas. The first two features are entitled "Humanizing Mr. Winsby" and "The Land Just Over Yonder." Inasmuch as both of these stories have appeared in the Saturday Evening Post and have consequently each been read by approximately ten million readers, any exhibitor who books these features for his house will have the advantage of tremendous national publicity behind him. The Dudley Motion Picture Manufacturing Company will produce one five or six-reel feature each month and these will form a regular release on the Unity program.

Two New Exchanges for Cleveland

Cleveland is beginning to look like a motion picture center with its gradual acquiring of film exchanges. The latest additions will be the Metro Picture Corporation and the Paramount Picture Corporation who are soon to open exchanges in that city. Up to this time the theaters using the programs of these two concerns depended upon Pittsburgh as their source supply. It is said both Paramount and Metro are to lease offices in the Sincere building.

Series Brings Results

With the help of the well-advertised Pathe's "Who's Guilty?" series, the Ideal Theater of Fairmont, West Virginia, has been able to raise its prices from five cents to ten cents. Mr. Carline, the manager, an unusually progressive exhibitor, is authority for the statement that "Who's Guilty?" turned the trick for him.

Manager Bradley of the Pittsburgh office sends in a clipping from the Fairmont West Virginian showing the following advertisement:

THE IDEAL THEATER

"The Lost Paradise" is the title of the eleventh of the series of pictures that have been running at this theater for the ten Thursdays past, and will be seen tomorrow, under the title of

"WHO'S GUILTY?"

Among other propositions suggested in this social problem play is the desirability of a uniform divorce law. The story is an exposition of the injustice frequently done the heirs of divorced couples on account of the unlikeness of the divorce requirements. These stories are appearing in the West Virginian each Saturday and are showing at the Ideal Theater the following Thursday.

TOMORROW THURSDAY

IDEAL THEATRE

Adults 10c Children 5c

Manager Bradley says in regard to this:

"Let's hope that some of our good friends who tell us about poor business and infantile paralysis will put more pep of this character back of their efforts. It will result in mutual satisfaction."

At American Studios

Richard Bennett is rushing to completion final scenes in "The Highest Good," a morality photoplay written by Clifford Howard, and directed by Rea Berger. The cast includes Adrienne Morrison, Blanche Hanson and George Periolat.

Mary Miles Minter is concentrating on "Faith," a multi-reel American-Mutual Feature written especially for her and directed by James Kirkwood. Beside Miss Minter, the cast mentions Lizette Thorne, Margaret (Mary's sister), Josephine Taylor, Gertrude Le Brandt, Clarence Burton and Perry Banks. Pastoral beauty and rugged coast scenes are photographed as some of the settings of this compelling story.

Frank Borzage and Anna Little are adding the finishing touches to "Immediate Lee," a virile western drama in five acts by Kenneth B. Clarke.

Kolb and Dill are getting along rapidly on "Peck o'Pickles," which promises to be a fun-maker typical of the high-powered comedy of this pair.

Ed. K. Lincoln, who is now starring in the "Jimmie Dale, alias The Grey Seal" series, is the owner of one of the best equipped studios in the country, located at Grantwood, New Jersey, where his Lincoln Players Company produces features. It was his intention during the next six months to produce a series of features in this studio, but on reading "Jimmie Dale" he became so enamored of the character of "Jimmie" that he laid aside all plans for his own producing company to appear in the "Grey Seal" series. His studio is now occupied by the William Fox Company, and several of the forthcoming Fox thrillers will be made there.

Paramount Promises Big Featurss

GALEXY OF STARS IN EXCEPTIONAL FEATURES FOR OCTOBER AND NOVEMBER

THE Paramount Pictures Corporation's announcement of its eighteen forthcoming releases for October and November proves the statement that it would make its third year particularly notable in the history of the motion picture industry and give the exhibitors the greatest productions this corporation has ever distributed.

The greatest variety of stars and productions are included in this list, and in the announcement Paramount has impressed upon its exhibitors that the playing stars in these productions are paying stars, for the list includes: Marguerite Clark, Pauline Frederick, Mae Murray, Marie Doro, Blanche Sweet, Lenore Ulrich, Vivian Martin, Fannie Ward, Marguerite Courtot, Ann Pennington, Louise Huff, Anita King, Myrtle Stedman, Cleo Ridgely, Owen Moore, Jack Pickford, Thomas Meighan, Sessue Hayakawa, Dustin Farnum, Wallace Reid and others.

Efficient Scenario Departments

Two years ago plans were laid by each of the Paramount producing companies for efficient photodramatic and scenario departments, and they have steadily grown so that all the list of writers, authors and dramatists now contributing to Paramount Pictures include some of the greatest writers of the age. Particular attention has been paid to the type of story that is accepted, and with its producing companies offering from $1,000 to $1,500 for a single idea, it is natural that they are receiving the best that is obtainable on the market.

The forthcoming releases announced are:

Oct. 2. Lasky, "The Lash," Marie Doro.
" 5. Lasky, "The Storm," Blanche Sweet.
" 9. Pallas, "The Intrigue," Lenore Ulrich.

With each of these forthcoming productions special exhibitors' aids will be distributed and the exchanges will render their clientele every assistance, in Paramount's country-wide endeavor to present its productions on a higher scale than ever before.

During the same two months there will be released by Paramount ten additional editions of the Paramount Pictographs, the magazine-on-the-screen, ten Paramount-Bray cartoons, ten Paramount-Burton Holmes Travel Pictures and five Paramount comedies.

The editors of the Paramount Pictographs have formulated great plans for these two months, and each release of the magazine-on-the-screen will have four leading subjects, all of which themselves would make a single reel picture, but each of these features has been cut to approximately 250 feet and four little features are put together in a single reel release.

At the Bray studios, where the Paramount cartoons are manufactured, additions are being made to the staff of writers and cartoonists, and future releases from this source promise to be of a higher calibre than before.

Burton Holmes Travel Pictures

Burton Holmes, who conducts the weekly trips-around-the-world for Paramount, has arranged a particularly interesting series of ten trips for these two months, beginning with "A Scotch-Irish Reel," after which some intimate glimpses will be given "In Old Ireland." From thence there will be a jump taken to the "Southern Italy" climate and from there the travelers go to "The Island of Capri." The following trip is a wonderful one, for it takes the travelers to Vesuvius and gives them pictures of this greatest of volcanoes in eruption. From there the trip leads to "In Classic Greece" and "In Modern Athens." In the latter pictures are shown the Olympian Games in Athens and a Marathon Day in Greece. After these visits are made to "Modern Egypt" and "The Real Streets of Cairo" and "Round About the Pyramids."

The five comedies that will be released by Paramount during this period are side-splitting affairs with real plots and real actors. Already these comedies have been highly praised by exhibitors.

The third comedy released as part of the Paramount program will be ready October 30. The United States Motion Picture Corporation produced the comedy entitled "A Troublesome Trip." This comedy is filled with side-splitting situations and clever trick photography. The story has to do with Box Car Bill and Journeying Jim, two typical hoboes, who run off with a street car, and the many vicissitudes of their journey.

Moss Releases on State Rights Basis

The initial release on the B. S. Moss Motion Picture Corporation one-a-month policy is "The Power of Evil," George Bronson Howard's scorching arraignment of the drink evil, which is now ready for state rights buyers.

The second release will be "The Woman Redeemed," by Stanley Kent. Marie Empress, favorite of the stage and screen, is the featured player in the photodrama.

Other productions now ready for review and in the course of production are "One Hour," the sequel to Elinor Glyn's "Three Weeks," and "One Day"; "In the Hands of the Law," by William O. H. Hurst; and "Boots and Saddles," by Eugene Walter, the noted playwright.

Commensurate with the importance of all these releases Mr. Moss accompanies them with live publicity methods, embracing trade and newspaper advertising, printing, heralds, cuts, advertising and press copy, supervised by publicity experts who know how to reach the public. A two-dollar attraction never was more thoroughly exploited than the Moss screen contributions.

"STAR SYSTEM" CONDEMNED

Alameda County, California, Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Condemn "Star System" and Advocate Flat Rental Basis on Films

At a meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Alameda County, California, held on September 21, the following resolution was passed:

"The motion picture exhibitors of Alameda County, California, in assembly do hereby resolve that the members of this organization declare themselves as being opposed to the individual 'star system' being exploited by certain promotion whose effort is to disrupt the organized program exchanges, by drawing away from the producers, certain star players by offering fabulous salaries, expecting to charge extortionate rentals from the exhibitors; That by encouraging the individual 'star system,' we believe will weaken the daily program exchanges by drawing from their company the best drawing card; and whereas it is necessary for the exhibitors to have a daily consistent program in order to maintain a steady average of patronage.

"Further, we are opposed to the present method of districting theaters as to the price of pictures per day, believing that the confidence of the exhibitors can be better maintained upon a flat rental based upon the age of the pictures.

"Also therefore be it resolved, that the secretary of this organization be instructed to send copies of this resolution to all trade journals, and film exchanges of the Pacific Coast."

Warning to Michigan Exhibitors

The following warning to exhibitors has been sent out by A. J. Moeller, secretary of the Michigan State Branch No. 4 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, in an effort to arouse them to the danger of taxation which is hanging over the theaters of Michigan:

"Definite information has been received that Michigan exhibitors will in all likelihood have to pay state license as follows: $300 for towns of 5,000 population or less, and from that up to $1,000 according to population.

"Unless some concerted action is taken at once to combat this issue some exhibitors are going to wake up some morning to find that it will be necessary to close their doors to the public."

All Michigan exhibitors are used to get into communication with A. J. Moeller, secretary Michigan League, Howell, Michigan, at once, for further information.

Variety to Handle "My Country First"

Louis Rosenbluh, president of the Variety Films Corporation, announces that he has acquired the rights for New York and New Jersey of the new Tom Terriss film, "My Country First," which deals with the timely topics of patriotism and preparedness, bringing home in a powerful manner the necessity for America to arm herself against outside enemies.

Mr. Terriss enacts the star role in this photoplay, which is in six parts, and is supported by a company including Jill Woodward, who gives a noteworthy representation of a vampire role, and Helene Ziegfield, who contributes a remarkable characterization.

The Committee of the Preparedness Bazaar, which is to be held in the Grand Central Palace, New York City, under the auspices of the American Patriots and Relief Society, is making arrangements for "My Country First."

California Motion Picture Company Will Present Beatriz Michelena in "The Passion Flower" Taken in Northern California

The California Motion Picture Corporation will soon present Beatriz Michelena in "The Passion Flower." This like "Salomy Jane" will exploit the northern part of California and is said to even excel the elaborate film version of the former picture. At last report, the producing company, headed by Miss Michelena, was isolated somewhere out in the mountain wilds, southwest of Lagunitas.

This section is commonly known as the "Bad Lands" of Marin County. It is a locality of almost inaccessible mountains and canyons and at one time offered retreat to some of California's most feared bandits.

Miss Michelena's role is that of a wild and ungovernable Spanish girl of the earlier California type. The part is said to contrast markedly with that of "The Woman" in "The Woman Who Dared."

Council Votes for Sunday Shows

Good news for picture fans and exhibitors of Rockford, Illinois, flashed from a recent caucus session of the city council when members voted unanimously to permit the Sunday operation of motion picture theaters.

On a referendum vote some time ago, Rockford people indicated their sentiment in favor of the Sunday moving picture shows and council shortly thereafter rescinded the old ordinance forbidding Sunday operation and passed a new measure legalizing Sunday movies. When the revision of the code was undertaken, some opposition to the Sunday plan developed and one or two members voiced their intention of fighting the ordinance. Opponents to the Sunday opening clause, harkening to public sentiment, apparently abandoned their fight, judging from the unanimity with which the Sunday opening ordinance was tentatively adopted for incorporation in the general municipal code.

World Buys Site for Large Studio

BRADY ANNOUNCES THE WORLD FILM OUTPUT COMPLETED TO MAY 29

THE World Film Corporation has secured a final option upon a tract of approximately 8,000 acres not far from Poughkeepsie, with a view to building a large studio and general production plant.

Architects and builders have already been consulted, and active construction operations will begin as soon as the numerous titles have been formally passed to the realty concern which has been engaged in assembling this extensive property.

A man prominently identified with World interests gave the following information:

"Naturally, we cannot go very far into details at this time without danger of embarrassing the gentlemen who have been buying up the numerous parcels of land required for so large an area as the one described for our purpose. But I may say that the property is extremely desirable for its accessibility by boat and rail, as well as for the extraordinary variety and beauty of its scenic advantages. These are practically inexhaustible, including lakes, streams, mountainous ridges, broad, fertile valleys, forests, old farms and lumber camps and a number of private estates.

"The World company's contract with the Paragon Studio terminated the other day and will be continued only in so far as our printing is concerned. We are so exceptionally well advanced with our completed releases, which cover the next six months, that it will not be necessary for us to overcrowd the facilities of our Peerless studio during this period, and considerably before its expiration the big new plant will be at our disposal in addition to the Peerless.

"The new studio will be the largest in the East, and as a matter of course this and the other buildings will be ultra modern in every particular."

World Production Ready in Advance

Under the direction of William A. Brady, the World Film Corporation continues the policy of completing its output far in advance, and now finds itself in a position to announce all of its releases up to and including May 29, more than seven months ahead.

There are several points of unusual interest and significance about this situation in addition to the main feature, which is that no other such feat has ever been accomplished in the motion picture business, so that the present performance sets a record which seems quite likely to stand for some time to come.

The completion of a large number of photoplays in this manner will naturally have the effect of stabilizing the World product, acting as an assurance to exhibitors and the public that the pictures are not hurriedly made in order to connect with an imminent release date, and that by the time they are due for delivery there will have been ample opportunity for the polishing process wherever needed.

Another and still more potential angle of this accumulation of picture plays, which seems to have escaped general attention, is that the World Film Corporation is increasing its actual, substantial assets at a rapid and important rate. The mere possession of so many completed and paid-for plays, for which there is a large and increasing market demand, is a matter of very considerable commercial interest pointing to singularly far-sighted sagacity of management.

The list of World-Brady pictures now complete and awaiting release is as follows:

Oct. 16, Ethel Clayton and Holbrook Blinn, in "The Hidden Scar"; Oct. 23, Gail Kane, in "The Scarlet Oath"; Oct. 30, Lew Fields, in "The Man Who Stood Still"; Nov. 6, Robert Warwick and Gail Kane, in "The Heart of a Hero"; Nov. 13, Ethel Clayton and Carlyle Blackwell, in "The New South"; Nov. 20, Alice Brady, in "Bought and Paid For"; Nov. 27, Gail Kane, in "The Man She Married"; Dec. 4, Robert Warwick, supported by Gerda Holmes and Mollie King, in "All Man"; Dec. 11, Clara Kimball Young, in "The Rise of Susan"; Dec. 18, Marie Dressler, in "Tillie's Day Out"; Dec. 25, E. K. Lincoln and June Elvidge, in "The World Against Him"; Jan. 2, Alice Brady, in "A Woman Alone"; Jan. 9, Gail Kane and Carlyle Blackwell, in "On Secret Service"; Jan. 16, Robert Warwick, supported by Doris Kenyon, in "A Movie Romance"; Jan. 23, Gail Kane in "Her God"; Jan. 30, Ethel Clayton and Carlyle Blackwell, in "The Wall Beyond"; Feb. 6, Robert Warwick, in "The Man Who Forgot"; Feb. 13, Alice Brady, in "The Girl and the Wager"; Feb. 20, Marie Dressler, in "Tillie's Divorce Case"; Feb. 27, Alice Brady, in "Darkest Russia"; March 6, Ethel Clayton and Carlyle Blackwell, in "Infatuation"; March 13, all star cast in "The Honor of the Waynes"; March 20, Robert Warwick, in "Lafitte, Pirate"; March 27, Marie Dressler, in "Tillie's Love Affair"; April 3, Alice Brady, in "The Madness of Helen"; April 10, Lew Fields, in "The Castaway"; April 17, Ethel Clayton and Carlyle Blackwell, in "The Evil Way"; April 24, all star cast, in "Shall We Forgive Her?"; May 1, Alice Brady, in "Sinners"; May 8, Marie Dressler, in "Tillie's Elopement"; May 15, Robert Warwick, in "The Page Case"; May 22, Ethel Clayton and Carlyle Blackwell, in "Girls Astray"; May 29, Alice Brady, in "Fifi."

WORK STARTED ON "THE WHIP"

English and American Stage Success Being Filmized by The Whip Motion Picture Company on an Extensive Scale

"The Whip," under the direction of Maurice Tourneur, is in process of production at the Paragon studio, Fort Lee, upon a scale of extraordinary magnitude. In fact, when Mr. Tourneur received the manuscript of this drama, the official word came with it that he was to have carte blanche in executing its transference from the speaking stage to the screen, and he threw himself into the task with undivided enthusiasm.

Beginning with the cast the director engaged all the members of the original company who were available, and these actors and actresses will appear under the camera in the roles they have already familiarized across the footlights. The remaining characters are to be assumed by players of uncommon distinction in motion pictures.

The opportunities for animated pictorial elaboration provided by "The Whip"' are remarkable in extent and variety. These include a fox hunt with a great pack of hounds 'cross country; an exciting and realistic automobile collision: an attempt on a moving English railway train to commit a daring crime; a railroad smash-up produced in the effort to wreck the car in which the greatest racehorse in Britain is on his way to the course; and the big race itself upon which the fortunes of the hero and heroine hang.

"The Whip" as a play was first produced at the Theater Royal, Drury Lane, London, and it was performed before tremendous audiences for two years, withdrawn and revived for another year.

With the complete original production the drama was brought to New York by William A. Brady and his associates, the Messrs. Shubert, and presented at the huge Manhattan Opera House. This great run, extending over a year, was followed by a series of engagements in other cities of the United States and Canada.

In this situation there seems to be very good reason to regard the play as one of the most valuable acquisitions in the history of stage drama taken over by the motion pictures. The screen version of "The Whip" will be in eight reels; produced by The Whip Motion Pictures Company, Inc., Fort Lee, New Jersey.

Ben Wilson and Francelia Billington are being featured in "The Mainspring" at Universal City. The photoplay is being picturized in five reels.

Losee Remains with Famous Players

Frank Losee, for many years with the Famous Players Company, has signed a contract to remain on the Paramount Program in Famous Players productions. Beside being starred in two features, Mr. Losee has supported all this company's well known stars, including Mary Pickford, Marguerite Clark, Pauline Frederick, Hazel Dawn, and Marie Doro.

Changes and Promotions in Paramount

A number of changes and promotions were effected during the past week in Paramount Pictures Corporation, immediately following the resignation of Wallace Thompson, who had been the director of publications and advertising for the corporation, and the promotion of Kenneth Hodkinson, to manager of Paramount.

Percy Helton in Golden Eagle Feature

INTERNATIONAL MAKES RECORD OF ASTOR CUP RACE IN HEARST NEWS PICTORIAL

TWENTY years on the stage is the record of Percy Helton, the juvenile actor appearing in International's Golden Eagle Feature, "The Flower of Faith." He played his first real part when only three years old and has been playing parts ever since. Helton has traveled five times across the continent, dodging in and out of New York before he reached his sixteenth year, to escape the Gerry society. His first big part was "Buster Brown," which he assumed at the age of twelve years. He has appeared in but two motion pictures, "The Fairy and the Waif," as co-star with Mary Miles Minter, and "The Flower of Faith," as co-star with Jane Grey and Frank Mills.

"Play Ball," the tenth episode of International's series "Beatrice Fairfax," released September 9, shows many scenes taken at the Polo grounds during the recent benefit game between the Giants and the Yankees. It shows both teams in action, with Manager McGraw of the Giants, Manager Donovan, of the Yankees, and all the stars, including Benny Kauff, Charley Herzog, "Heinie" Zimmerman, Fritz Maisel, Walter Kipp and others, putting up as great a game as they ever played. The camera caught Benny Kauff knocking the home run which won the game, and the vast audience going wild with enthusiasm.

It was in this game that Ferd Schupp, the Giant pitcher, was knocked out of the box by the Yankees, after which he started his long run of victories which form a part of the Giants' great record.

In addition to the baseball stars, four of the International's stars have prominent parts in the episode. They are Harry Fox, who is the real star of the series; Grace Darling, Olive Thomas, and Nigel Barrie.

Nelson E. Edwards, one of the most daring motion picture photographers, has returned to America after having spent a year on the German, Balkan and French battlefronts. Mr. Edwards brought back with him many thousands of feet of film for the Hearst News Pictorial that he was unable to send. Every courtesy was extended to the photographer by the German military authorities and he was enabled to get pictures of Keil Canal and Wilhelmshaven, the great naval strongholds; the sea fight off the Skagerrak, visit the Balkans and Constantinople and the western front of the Vosges Mountains. Many of the films were taken under fire and several times the entire outfit was saved from destruction by shrapnel by running into dugouts.

The International in order to concentrate its offices has leased the entire fifteenth floor of the Godfrey Building, 729 Seventh avenue, New York City. The new arrangement gives the company two entire floor adjoining, the fifteenth and the sixteenth. The fifteenth floor will house the enlarged animated cartoon department, the New York exchange, the business department and a projection room furnished in the Adam style which will seat fifty people. This will be exclusively for showing the latest releases to exhibitors. The sixteenth floor contains the executive offices and there will be another projection room devoted wholly to the use of executives.

The International scored another great beat for the Hearst News Pictorial with the Astor Cup Race pictures. The race was decided at five o'clock and four hours later, at nine o'clock, the film was shown in a number of New York theaters. The International is particularly proud of the achievement, following its beats on the arrival of the Deutschland at Baltimore and Bremen and the New Jersey explosion.

Carroll McComas, who is playing the leading part in "Seven Chances," now appearing at the Cohen Theater in New York, is the latest acquisition to the International fashion stars. Miss McComas is posing in the latest creations for the Hearst International News Pictorial. Others of the International fashion stars are the Dolly Sisters, Olive Thomas, Beth Lydey, Marion Davies, Dolly Hackett and Mineta Timayo.

In one episode of "Patria," the preparedness serial of the International, Mrs. Vernon Castle, impersonates two characters, "Patria" and Mlle. Elaine. The remarkable part of the double characterization is the apparent difference in the height of the two figures, both impersonated by Mrs. Castle. The director who made the picture admits that high-heeled shoes are responsible to a certain extent. He refuses, however, to account for the apparent difference of fully six inches.

Third Kolb and Dill Drama Ready

WINNIFRED GREENWOOD, EDWARD COXEN AND EDWIN AUGUST IN NEW ONES

AT the top of the list of Mutual offerings for the week of October 16 are two Mutual Star productions, "The Voice of Love," in which Winnifred Greenwood and Edward Coxen are featured, assisted by Laura Sears, George Field and Harvey Clark; and "Bluff," the third of the five-part drama releases of Kolb and Dill, the famous partners. Kolb and Dill and May Cloy are at their best in this drama and it promises to be still more popular than the two previously released.

Tuesday will bring another feature in which Winnifred Greenwood, Edward Coxen and George Field appear, "The Franchise," a story of thrilling intrigue and underhand dealings both in love and politics.

"The Law of Nature," released on October 18, is a two-part drama in which Edwin August is starred. Mr. August, himself the director, spared no time or money to secure an exquisite background for this drama, which deals with the desire for home and children, which dominates the hearts of most men. Iva Shepard, Ruth Blair and William Bailey support Mr. August.

The remaining drama releases for the week consists of a Gaumont two-part picture entitled "Looking Westward," appearing on Tuesday, October 17.

On Wednesday will be released the one-reel topical, Mutual Weekly No. 94, filled with the news of the day as gathered by the able cameraman of Pell Michell of the Gaumont forces. The split reel scenic, "See America First," and Harry Palmer's Kartoon Komics will also go to the public on that day.

There are three Cub funny pictures for the week. "He Wouldn't Tip," a comic of unusual character and full of original business, will appear Friday, October 20. On Saturday, "That Dog Gone Baby" and "The Deacon's Widow," Cubs both, will constitute the Mutual's release.

The Sunday output will consist of the usual Vogue two-reel comedy and the Mutual's magazine in film, "Reel Life." Paddy McQuire, with his inimitable talents turned to "Her Painted Pedigree," will appear in the laugh maker for Sunday.

Schedule for Week of October 23

William Russell, Helene Rosson and Franklin Ritchie are prominent in Mutual's output for the week of October 23, which is composed of film dramas, comedies and scenic and current news material of great variety.

In "The Love Hermit" William Russell is supported by Charlotte Burton and a cast composed of Queenie Rosson, William Stowell, Harry von Meter and Ashton Dearholt.

"The Undertow," featuring Helene Rosson and Franklin Ritchie, is the retitle for "Esther of the People," a five-part feature produced under the direction of Frank Thorne. The story is from the pen of Rosalie Ashton. Eugenie Forde takes an important role in this play and others in the supporting cast are Orral Humphrey, Harry von Meter, George Ahern, Charles Newton and Josephine Taylor.

The drama output of shorter reel lengths consists of "Professor Jeremy's Experiment," produced by the American company and featuring Orral Humphrey; "The Folly of Fear," co-starring Edwin August and Iva Shepard, assisted by William Bailey and Ruth Blair; and "At Twelve o'Clock."

The comedy releases number some very amusing Cubs, one American Beauty, aside from Harry Palmer's animated cartoon which forms half of the split reel, "See America First," from the Gaumont Company.

"Lovers and Lunatics," "Dad's Experiment" and "When Cubs Were Trumps," are the Cub one reelers of the week.

"He Died and He Didn't," a two-reel comedy featuring Rube Miller and Ben Turpin, in which Lillian

You have already recognized the honorable Misters Kolb and Dill as headliners in Mutual's new "Bluff," on the left, and also what Herr Kolb is doing in the circle. The dinner scene is from American-Mutual's "The Franchise," with Winnifred Greenwood and George Field.

Hamilton also plays an important part, is the regular Vogue Sunday release.

"Mutual Weekly No. 95" and the split reel, "See America First," and Kartoon Komics appears as usual on Wednesday. "Reel Life," the Mutual's magazine in film goes out on Sunday. All are produced by the Gaumont Company.

McCLURE SERIES PROGRESSING

Charlotte Walker Portrays Three Historical Characters in "Sloth"—Nance O'Neil and Alfred Hickman Working on "Greed"

Four periods of American history will be depicted in "Sloth," one of the parts of the McClure Pictures series "Seven Deadly Sins."

Charlotte Walker is the star of this picture which is unique in many ways. It is unusual because although it is a five-reel film Miss Walker does not appear in the first or fifth reels. When Miss Walker does appear she portrays three historic characters. The second reel shows her depicting Margaret Brent, the beautiful girl who became Lord Baltimore's official representative in the early settlement days of Maryland; in the third reel she assumes the role of Sally Wells, the sixteen year old maid of an old Dutch settlement on Staten Island; and in the fourth reel she appears as Molly Pitcher, the dearest hoyden in American history.

Notwithstanding these historic scenes "Sloth" has a modern setting. A young girl (Shirley Mason) is asked by her soldier-lover (George Le Guere) to choose between her life of luxurious indolence, and a life in which pioneer courage is required. Miss Walker steps from the past in her quaint characters to influence the girl to choose the heroic way by showing her the heritage of bravery and devotion to country that has come down to inspire American women of today.

To insure the historical accuracy of her settings and costumes, Miss Walker invested in $60 worth of books dealing with the various periods of the play, and spent weeks in absorbing the atmospheres of these quaint times.

"Sloth" emphasizes the dangers of indolence in our national life; the peril of permitting luxury to usurp the place of the simplicity of our forefathers. The introduction of this theme connects the series, "Seven Deadly Sins," with the national side of life in a vivid and stirring way—and it is confidently predicted that "Sloth" will do more to rouse the nation's conscience than any play or book yet put forth.

Although each picture of the McClure series "Seven Deadly Sins," is complete in itself there is a connected love story which runs through them. Eve Leslie and George Le Guere are the principals throughout but in addition to the romantic adventures of this couple there are strong parts in which Ann Murdock, Holbrook Blinn, Nance O'Neil and Charlotte Walker star.

Nance O'Neil and her husband, Alfred Hickman, have started work on "Greed," the third play of the forthcoming McClure series. As the marriage of these two players is of very recent date this working in the same pictures enables them to continue their honeymoon.

"Seven Deadly Sins," the new series presented by McClure Pictures, has a connected love story throughout. Nance O'Neill, on the left, appears in "Greed," the third of the series. Below are scenes from "Sloth," in which Charlotte Walker is starred.

Requisites for One Reel Comedy

By J. O. Walsh,

President of the United States Motion Picture Corporation, producers of single reel comedies for Paramount Pictures Corporation.

With the advent of the Black Diamond Comedy for the Paramount Pictures Corporation there begins a new era in the making of the single reel comedy. It is a well known fact among the producers and also the majority of exhibitors that to make a single reel comedy is the most difficult undertaking in the motion picture business. Most single reelers intended for comedy, develop into a deep tragedy by the time they are ready for exhibition. There is a logical reason for this frequently disastrous result and it is simply that a consistent story must be told; a logical plot must be formulated and carried out and the requisite laugh producing "punches" inserted to please the very critical audience of today, and this must all be done in one thousand feet of film.

To carry this out to a successful conclusion, the United States Motion Picture Corporation, makers of Black Diamond Comedy, have worked out a process for trick photography, hitherto unknown to motion pictures. The expense of filming some of the scenes portrayed by this organization is considerable, but we contend it makes little or no difference how much a picture may cost to produce if it pleases the public.

Black Diamond Comedies are superbly photographed, the stories are clean to an extremely fine degree and the sensational climaxes so cleverly worked out that these comedies are smashing successes.

"The Devil's Die" is being filmed at Universal City in five reels by Director Lloyd Carleton.

Bernard in Second Vitagraph Feature

KATHARINE LEWIS PLAYS FIRST LEAD OPPOSITE EARLE WILLIAMS

The inimitable Jewish characterizer, Barney Bernard, in Vitagraph's "A Prince in a Pawn Shop."

BARNEY BERNARD, who became famous on the legitimate stage for his clever portrayal of the Jew of commercial instincts in "Potash and Perlmutter," achieved the feat of recreating that character on the screen in "Phantom Fortunes." In his second Vitagraph feature appearance in "A Prince in a Pawnshop," released October 16, he creates another characterization and reveals the philanthropic side of the modern Jew as he really is when all prejudices are set aside. The play is an adaptation of the story of the same name by Marie de Sarlabous and Andre de Sagurola, and is directed by Parl Scardon.

Supporting Mr. Bernard appear Garry McGarry, Bobby Connelly, Edna Hunter, Charlotte Ives, Brinsley Shaw and Lester Bernard.

Katharine Lewis has been selected by President Albert E. Smith of the Greater Vitagraph to play opposite Earle Williams in the forthcoming James Oliver Curwood story directed by Marguerite Bertsch. For the past year Miss Lewis has taken numerous small parts, each one a trifle more important than the preceding one, and she has rapidly acquired the technique of the screen. In keeping with its policy of encouraging young women who are called upon for minor parts in its productions, the Greater Vitagraph organization feels that Katharine Lewis has won her spurs and this lead part is a recognition of her services and budding talent.

This announcement will serve to correct one made recently to the effect that Naomi Childers would play opposite Earle Williams in this production. Billie Billings also will portray one of the principal roles in Miss Bertsch's production of Mr. Curwood's story, the name of which will be shortly decided upon.

Frank Daniels in New Style Comedies

Frank Daniels has returned from his vacation ready to start to work on some new comedies which are constructed along entirely new lines, more or less built to order for Mr. Daniels. Vay Dyke Brooke, whose forte as a director has always been one, two or three part productions, will take charge of Mr. Daniels' scripts.

Frank Loomis, Vitagraph's casting director, is now engaging a capable supporting company for Mr. Daniels, including a feminine lead the announcement of whose name in the near future should cause smiles of satisfaction to appear upon the faces of the exhibitors who will get first runs of all Vitagraph-Daniels comedies.

Beginning October 29 the Greater Vitagraph will release its Hughie Mack comedies, directed by Lawrence Semon, through the distributing organization known as V-L-S-E, Inc.

In collaboration with Graham Baker of Vitagraph's Scenario Department, Mr. Semon has written a great many of the scripts for these comedies, as well as having directed them.

Among the important members of the company there can be named the following: Hughie Mack, Patsey De Forest, Edward Dunn, William Shea, Joseph Simberg and Frank Brule.

Edith Storey on Western Trip

Edith Storey, the Vitagraph star, accompanied by her mother, is making a trip from New York to Los Angeles, with stopovers in the principal cities along the way, including Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Dallas and Antonio. Upon her arrival in Los Angeles she will appear in the leading photoplay houses, where some of her features are now showing. It is estimated that Miss Storey will appear in fifty-three theaters before she arrives in Los Angeles. The production that will be put on with Miss Storey in the leading role at Vitagraph's Western studio in Hollywood is "Alladin From Broadway." It is probable that she will be under the direction of William Wolbert.

Miss Storey and her mother were given a rousing send-off at the Grand Central Station by a big delegation of Vitagraph favorites, V-L-S-E salesmen and exhibitors. Seated in the cab of the electric locomotive, with her hand on the throttle, the star was photographed with a group of Vitagraph players around her.

The Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company of Chicago has just gotten out a pocket notebook for cameramen, in which detailed and numbered descriptions of scenes taken can be kept, along with a record of the number of feet of film exposed. The book fills a real need for cameramen, both in studio and news work. It sells for fifteen cents.

Charlotte Walker Joins Thanhouser

Charlotte Walker, famous for her successes as a star on the screen as well as upon the speaking stage, has joined the Thanhouser Film Corporation and will begin work immediately upon a five-reel feature by Lloyd Lonergan to be released through the Pathe exchanges.

Charlotte Walker, well-known legitimate actress, who has signed with Thanhouser.

It is Edwin Thanhouser's policy to sign for his plays actors particularly suited to the parts, and the list of Thanhouser artists now includes Miss Walker, Vincent Serrano, Jeanne Eagels and Valkyrien, added, of course, to Florence La Badie, Frederick Warde, Gladys Hulette, Doris Grey and Wayne Arey, who for some time have been firmly established as stars in Thanhouser features.

In her first Thanhouser feature Miss Walker will play the part of a girl convicted of murder, who escapes and marries, concealing her secret from her husband. The story is crowded with exciting scenes, including a train wreck in which the heroine, on her way to prison, makes her escape.

Miss Walker has been on the stage since 1895. She toured with Richard Mansfield, had important parts with Marie Dressler, James A. Herne, James K. Hackett, Kyrle Bellew and E. H. Sothern. She has starred in "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine," "Just a Wife," "Boots and Saddles," "The Warrens of Virginia," "The Wolf," and "The Two Virtues."

Before joining Thanhouser her motion picture experience included starring engagements with Lasky and McClure.

Zukor Recovers from Operation

Adolph Zukor has returned to his desk at the Famous Players-Lasky offices after several days' absence due to a slight operation.

For over a year the president of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation has been suffering from a slight but troublous ailment but has repeatedly refused to permit the surgeons to perform the very minor operation which was necessary to relieve his distress, always on the plea that he could not leave his work.

The tremendous amount of work which fell to his lot in the perfection of the merging of the Famous Players and the Lasky companies into one concern kept Mr. Zukor so busy that he scarcely had time to notice the pain. But with the perfection of the organization and the breathing spell which was thus permitted him, he awoke to a realization of the fact that his suffering was much more acute than it had previously been. Upon his admission of that fact to his own family, he was practically forced to place himself in the hands of his surgeons and went to the hospital protesting he could not waste the time necessary recuperating from the effect of the operation.

Upon his arrival at his office from the hospital Mr. Zukor found a large bouquet of flowers at his desk, the gift of his associates.

PARAMOUNT-FAMOUS FEATURES

Ann Pennington, Louise Huff and Jack Pickford in Latest Famous Players Features—Third Paramount Comedy

Two Famous Players productions constitute the principal features on the Paramount Program for the week of October 23. Ann Pennington, of Ziegfeld "Follies" fame, is starred in "The Rainbow Princess," a photoplay of circus life by Shannon Fife; and Louise Huff and Jack Pickford are co-stars in "Seventeen," a picturization of Booth Tarkington's latest novel.

William Courtleigh, Jr., Clifford Gray, Augusta Anderson, Grant Stewart, Charles Sutton, Harry Lee, Edwin Sturgis, Walter D. Mealand, Herbert Rice, Queen Pearl, Ann Manning and Carl Gordon support Miss Pennington.

During this same week Paramount will release a number of exceptional "little features," included in which are the thirty-seventh edition of the Paramount Pictographs, the magazine-on-the-screen; the thirty-eighth weekly "Trips-Around-the-World" with Burton Holmes, in which a visit is made to the Island of Capri, and the Paramount-Bray cartoon, "Bobby Bumps Helps Out a Book Agent," drawn by Earl Hurd.

The four leading subjects in the Paramount Pictographs are "Bubbles Worth While," picturing the wonderful accomplishment of the glass-blowing industry, the pictures being taken in the plant where glassware service was made for Presidents Lincoln and Harrison; "The School for Heroes," showing the training of university football squads; "Land Battleships," illustrating use of caterpillar tractors in farming; and "The Hague of Dogdom," showing the first peace tribunal ever held by the dog delegates from every country.

Burton Holmes' travel picture takes the audience to the Island of Capri, famous for its Blue Grotto, its wonderful climate, its legends, its hospitality and its historic romances from days when the sirens sat on the waters' edge and sang beguiling songs to Ulysses and his crew. Many charming side trips are also taken in this release.

The third Paramount comedy to be released by Paramount will be "A Troublesome Trip," produced by the United States Motion Picture Corporation, which will be issued October 30. This comedy is filled with side-splitting situations and the wonderful amount of clever trick photography which has so materially added in making this "little feature" one of the best sellers in the market.

Famous Players have arranged for a great many exhibitor's aids and special advertising and publicity for the two leading features for this week, while Paramount for each of its features and short reel releases will distribute a large number of additional helps in its endeavor to have its thousands of exhibitors place before the motion picture public these productions on the high standard Paramount is setting throughout the country.

Selznick Releases Talmadge Pictures

CLARA KIMBALL YOUNG'S SECOND FEATURE AN ADAPTATION OF DIXON'S NOVEL

THE great success which attended the showing of the first Selznick Pictures, Clara Kimball Young in "The Common Law," has led to the announcement by Lewis J. Selznick of the forming of other special companies for popular actresses whose productions will be shown under the Selznick banner. The latest addition to this list of stars is Norma Talmadge, whose work in recent Triangle productions is well known.

Norma Talmadge, capable actress who is to appear in Selznick productions.

Joseph Shenck, of the Marcus Loew forces, has organized the Norma Talmadge Film Corporation, of which he is president. Mr. Schenck will have offices with the Selznick Enterprises in the Godfrey Building, New York City, and will also produce for Selznick-Pictures feature photoplays starring other screen celebrities.

The first of Miss Talmadge's new pictures will be an adaptation of "The Price She Paid," a novel by David Graham Phillips. The production will be directed by Allan Dwan, who has produced a number of Miss Talmadge's Triangle pictures.

The success of the negotiations for the rights to this novel was due to Edgar Selden, who has been working months to obtain this and other of David Graham Phillips' work for Mr. Selznick. Many film producers have attempted to secure the rights to the works of this famous American author, but Mr. Selznick is the first to have any success.

Miss Talmadge's first work of note was done with the Vitagraph Company and it was after her portrayal of the leading role in "The Battle Cry of Peace" that she was invited to join the Triangle studios. Two of her most recent successes are "Going Straight" and "The Social Secretary."

Miss Talmadge will be presented in about eight big features a year along lines similar to other Selznick-Pictures, such as Clara Kimball Young, Herbert Brenon and Kitty Gordon features. The Talmadge productions will be marketed on the open booking plan through the big system of exchanges built up by Mr. Selznick.

Clara Kimball Young in Dixon's Novel

With the first picture made under her own company, "The Common Law" drawing crowded houses, Clara Kimball Young has resumed work and is now preparing her second big production, an adaptation of Thomas Dixon's novel, "The Foolish Virgin."

Work on this second picture was interrupted during the past week owing to Miss Young's many engagements in connection with the pre-release showings of "The Common Law" in New York and Boston. Miss Young, accompanied by Mr. Selznick, has appeared in person before the audiences in the theaters in which the photoplay was being shown. At the Marcus Loew theaters in New York and the Globe Theater in Boston the audiences packed the houses and extended out into the street in an effort to get a glimpse of the star. Miss Young was also tendered a reception in Boston at which the Governor of Massachusetts was the guest of honor.

On either side below are, as you have already guessed, scenes from the beautiful Selznick production, "The Common Law," with the popular Clara Kimball Young. In the center are two glimpses suggesting the intense power of "War Brides," the coming Herbert Bernon-Selznick production whose leading role is played by none other than the unique and celebrated Nazimova, who interpreted the same role so sensationally on her recent tour of the stage.

Director General Albert Capellani, who directed "The Common Law," and is also directing "The Foolish Virgin," has made rapid progress with the scenic construction for the second production. Many of the exterior scenes in which Miss Young does not appear have already been taken and it is expected that the picture will be finished and ready for release early in November.

Among the noted players who will appear in important roles in "The Foolish Virgin" are Conway Tearle, who scored such a brilliant hit in the role opposite Miss Young in "The Common Law," and Paul Capellani, who has been seen in a number of Miss Young's biggest productions and whose work in "The Common Law" in the role of Querida attracted wide attention.

Others in the cast include Catherine Proctor, William Welsh, Marie Lines, Agnes Mapes, Edward Elkas and the two well-known child players, Sheridan Tansey and Jacqueline Morhange.

Operetta Music for Fox Spectacle

The new art-form of film operetta will characterize the musical side of "A Daughter of the Gods" when produced by William Fox at the Lyric Theater, New York,

One of the unique scenes from Fox's "A Daughter of the Gods."

October 17. Previous attempts to unite pictorial and musical motifs have ranged from the humble cue sheet of the ten-cent show to the selective score or the grand operatic experiment of some well known composer for the first-class houses. But Robert Hood Bowers was engaged by Mr. Fox to write for the Kellermann fantasy with the same gay and frolicsome originality, if possible, as that he displayed in composing "The Vanderbilt Cup" or "The Rose Maid." The result is said to be a true film light opera in which the instrumental voices for the various characters take the place of human voices in speaking operetta, just as pictures take the place of the legitimate stage and its properties and people.

Robert Hood Bowers has engaged forty-five of the instrumentalists who have worked under him in recent light opera and musical comedy successes. Mr. Bowers consented to direct the first night in person, as well as the preliminary rehearsals.

Director William V. Mong is picturizing "His Old Plantation Home" in two reels at Universal City.

New Triangle Distributors

Readjustment of the distributing plan of the Triangle Film Corporation on the basis announced last week continues. Following the statement that Alfred Weiss, former eastern district superintendent of Triangle, had purchased a fifty per cent interest in the New York branch office controlling the New York territory, the announcement is now made that Louis B. Mayer, one of the most prominent exchange men of Boston, has purchased a similar interest in the New England territory, with headquarters in Boston.

Alfred Weiss, who handles the Triangle output in New York.

In the arrangement by which Mr. Mayer takes over the New England Triangle territory on the plan described, a redistribution of territory has been made. Hitherto the State of Connecticut has been included in the New York district, but with the advent of Mr. Mayer it is sliced off New York and attached to his exclusive New England district.

Well-known film men from all parts of the country are in New York in daily consultation with Triangle officials, and the new deal is being engineered with dispatch and enthusiasm. While at first there was some hesitation on the part of a few individuals as to the entire feasibility of the Triangle plan, nothing but enthusiasm on the part of the film exchange experts from other cities is manifested where the full details have been gone into. It is becoming apparent that Triangle's decision to admit the independent exchange man to a practical partnership is proving not only popular, but is setting the ace for what one of the independent operators describes as "a necessary and logical return to the conditions that put the film business in the strong position it is to-day. "An industry," this individual went on, "that has leaped into fifth place in the great industries of the country never got there by any grab-all policies."

"I am very well satisfied with the situation as its progresses from day to day," said President H. E. Aitken of the Triangle Film Corporation, when queried as to the progress of events.

Broadway Star Feature on General

During the week of October 16, the Vitagraph Company releases five reels of film through the exchanges of the General Film Company. On October 16, "The Curse of the Forest," a one-part motion picture shows methods of fighting and the devastation which follows in the wake of a forest fire. The fire which Director Earle photographed occurred in the South Mountains of Franklin County, Pa. It covered a large area and a number of the fighters were severely burned.

The next release, that of October 20, is a one-reel picture entitled "Strong Evidence."

On Saturday, October 21, the Broadway Star Feature, "The Harbor of Happiness," is released. This subject which was directed by Van Dyke Brooke, features Leah Baird.

Unusual Bookings on Pathe's Serial

RELEASE INDEFINITELY POSTPONED ON "PEARL OF THE ARMY"

This hunting lodge is really the Thanhouser studio, where Eugene Moore is directing Jeanne Eagels in Pathe's coming drama, "The World and the Woman."

Edward Jose captured Fort Wadsworth and a segment of the United States Army for Pathe's "Pearl of the Army." Miss White is the feminine high light, above.

THE bookings on Pathe's serial "The Shielding Shadow" continue to increase beyond all expectations during the first week of its release. Most of the advance bookings on the serial were for the first run showing in large theaters in the metropolitan cities. Exhibitors in the smaller cities, remembering they profited by the advertising of the first run houses on "The Iron Claw," awaited an opportunity to book the serial for first showing in their communities. These bookings have swelled the total business on "The Shielding Shadow" to record figures. Already nine of the exchanges have wired for extra prints and reorders have been placed for all advertising matter.

Many exhibitors are showing both "The Grip of Evil" and "The Shielding Shadow" and others have booked "The Shielding Shadow" for a full week's showing.

For these reasons, a majority of the branches requested the postponement of "Pearl of the Army," the new military serial, and J. A. Berst, vice-president and general manager of the Pathe exchange has, therefore, indefinitely postponed the release of this serial as he realizes this request reflects the views of the exhibitors.

Kipling Picture Booked for Week

The first Kipling story to be put into pictures, Pathe's "The Light That Failed," has been booked for a solid week's run by General Manager Larsen and Theater Manager Harris of the Boston Theater of Bosson, Mass. This theater is owned by the Keiths and by a special request of both Mr. Keith and Mr. Kipling the first public American showing of this picture is to be held at this famous theater. The fame of Mr. Kipling, the reputation of Robert Edeson, and the success of Edward Jose, have all contributed to the unusual amount of business being done on this feature. A prominent New York newspaper man who viewed the film said that Robert Edeson had not been so satisfying since the days of "Strongheart," and his characterization of "Dick Heldar" in this film shows that a new field of artistic endeavor lies ahead of him in a field in which he gives promise of splendid achievement. The final judgment of this critic was that " 'The Light That Failed' is a praiseworthy accomplishment; there is no question that it will make a great hit with film fans, particularly women."

Gotthold to Play Lead for Astra

Charles Gotthold has been engaged by the Astra Film Corporation to play the male lead in A. H. Wood's play "The Challenge," which is now being produced by Donald Mackenzie for the Pathe Gold Rooster program. Mr. Gotthold was for a number of years associated with Henry Miller in the play, "The Great Divide." He also appeared with John Drew and Blanche Ring.

Big Cabaret Fire in Serial

In the third episode of "The Shielding Shadow," "The Mystic Defender," the big feature is the fire in the Cabaret. A regular cabaret was fitted up under the direction of Louis J. Gasnier, president of the Astra Film Corporation, which produced this serial for Pathe, and a large number of actors and actresses were secured to enact patrons of the cabaret, also chorus girls, waiters and other cabaret attendants.

The scenario called for a panic when the cabaret burned. It was meant to be a make-believe panic, but some of the girls had not been through a motion picture fire. They really became panic-stricken when they saw the flames around them, heard the wood crackling and had their lungs filled with smoke.

Director Donald Mackenzie shouted in vain to them to do as they had been instructed. A camera man tried to stop them, also as he said the players were enacting a panic much better than the director had instructed them to do.

Baby Osborne in New Feature

Baby Helen Marie Osborne, re-christened "Little Mary Sunshine," will return to the screen on November 12 in "Shadows and Sunshine," a Pathe Gold Rooster play. In this film she is again directed by Henry King of Balboa, who has shown rare talent in bringing out the best there is in the baby star. A little darky plays opposite "Little Mary Sunshine" and together they furnish some scenes of rare amusement.

"The Sultana" in Pathe Color

Pathe will release on October 29 "The Sultana," a beautiful Gold Rooster Play in Pathe color. The story is an adaptation from Henry C. Rowland's novel and features Ruth Roland supported by William Conklin and a capable cast including Daniel Gilfeather, Charles Dudley and Frank Erlanger.

When the Pathe officials first viewed this film they were so impressed with the careful artistic selection the Balboa directors had exercised in the outdoor settings that they decided to give it an added value and sent it to the Pathe studios in France to be colored. In its present shape it is a splendid example of color photography.

Motion Pictures Teach Surgery

For the first time motion pictures have been applied as an aid to the most difficult operations in surgery. A short time ago Dr. S. William Schapira, member of the Academy of Medicine of New York, lectured at Fordham University on various genito-urinary operations, and illustrated his lecture with motion pictures of actual operations performed by him. These pictures, which possess an extraordinary scientific value, cover thirteen distinct operations, and were made by a Pathe cameraman under Dr. Schapira's direction. In the past surgical lectures have been illustrated by "still" pictures or drawings and much of the detail has been lost. In these motion pictures every movement is clearly shown and it is not too much to say that a new era has dawned in the teaching of surgery.

Kathlyn Williams, supported by an all star cast including Eugenie Besserer, Guy Oliver, Charles West and Vivian Reed, appears in General Film Company's regular service on Monday, November 13, in the three reel Diamond Special, "The Temptation of Adam."

Inventors of Under-Sea Photography

WILLIAMSON BROTHERS FULLY PROTECT THEIR PROPERTY

WITHOUT intention to deceive, some of the most reliable of the daily and weekly papers have erroneously published statements and news items which have had a tendency to mislead as to where the true credit for all submarine motion picture photography rightfully belongs.

The Williamson Brothers alone are the originators and sole producers of this latest and most valuable addition to the motion picture industry, and the only pictures now before the public which have been manufactured with the aid of the Williamson inventions and submarine photographic devices are "The Williamson Submarine Expedition Pictures" now being shown in nearly every corner of the universe, and the unusual and marvelous submarine scenes in "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," which opened at the Studebaker Theater, Chicago, on October 9.

Without the aid of these inventions and devices and the scientific knowledge and accomplishments of the Williamson Brothers, neither of these noted pictures could have been manufactured. In a period of time covering more than four years the Williamson Brothers and the Submarine Film Corporation have expended a half million dollars in continuous undersea research, with submarine chambers, collapsible tubes, diving devices and special photographic appliances, all of which have been fully protected under United States and foreign patent rights. During these years of operations and research work, the Williamson Brothers have gone down under the sea, through the Williamson Tube, to the photographic chamber below, and have cruised about over the floor of the ocean, searching out locations of practically all the old wrecks known in the West Indies, and have charted their locations carefully for future use.

An example of Williamson Brothers' sea-bottom photography.

In the unusual undersea film stories that the Williamson Brothers will produce will be shown clearly these old derelicts of the pirate days, the remains of old Spanish vessels and treasure chests, and the ancient armor and fittings of the vessels of the Spanish Main.

In the Sargasso Sea and in sheltered spots of the thousands of islands in the Caribbean Sea are to be found the fitting haunts of the deep sea monsters. It is here that scientists, submarine engineers, expert divers, and men skilled in the habits of the shark, the octopus, the sea spider, and other monsters of the deep, will battle with them in their native haunts with the purpose of weaving this most thrilling feature of adventure into the thread of the deep-sea pictures.

Floating studios, fully equipped for the carrying of one or more companies and directors, will encircle the islands of the West Indies, making pictures with tropical background and native environment. Sea-going yachts of sufficient capacity for this work have been contracted for, and in addition to submarine pictures, tropical and marine features will be produced in lengths ranging from five to ten reels.

The phenomenal success which greeted the "Williamson Submarine Expedition Pictures," coupled with the later marvelous submarine scenes in "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," made under the personal supervision of the Williamson Brothers, have combined in giving them a world-wide reputation.

Executive offices are established on the eighth floor of the Longacre Building, New York City, and branches are being opened in London, Chicago, Los Angeles and Sydney.

BOOSTING "THE CRISIS"

H. A. Sherman Plans Country Wide Advertising for Selig Play—Will Use Large City Dailies in Publicity Campaign

An unusual advertising campaign for "The Crisis," the ten-reel Selig play, has been arranged by H. A. Sherman, president of Sherman-Elliott, Inc., who owns this production. The leading daily newspapers of the country have been quick to realize the possibilities of "The Crisis" as a story to their readers and will run special stories from this photoplay telling of characters taken from Winston Churchill's novel. The Chicago Herald, New Orleans Item, St. Paul Pioneer Press, Boston News, as well as the New York Mail, have already run special articles with illustrations featuring Sam D. Drane as Lincoln.

"If Lincoln's elected we fight." Scene from Sherman-Elliott's "The Crisis," produced by Selig. Owner H. A. Sherman smiles at the right.

Arrangements have been completed for the publication in a motion picture magazine which goes directly to the public of a ten thousand word story of "The Crisis," taken from Mr. Churchill's book.

Grossett & Dunlap, publishers, have have already issued a photoplay edition of "The Crisis" which is illustrated with scenes from the screen drama. This firm has arranged to follow the bookings of the film play in every town in the United States by an advertising campaign for the local bookseller and circulating library, working in conjunction with the exhibitor in the promotion of the film. Splendid one sheets costing 10 cents each and unusual window displays will be used, as well as the columns of the local newspapers. Thus the great popularity of the novel will be of direct benefit to even the smallest exhibitor.

An exceptional line of ones, threes, sixes, nines and twenty-four sheets, both in type block and pictorial, have been designed. Ad. and print sheets have been prepared with the needs of the exhibitor and the taste of the public in mind, as well as slides, lobby display photographs and attractive heralds printed on a good quality of stock and illustrated with colored photographs from the production. In order that the exhibitor may obtain the best result from his advertisement, a campaign letter offering suggestions will be included.

"The Crisis," declared Mr. Sherman, "is America's greatest American story and will prove the best money maker on the screen today and will be for some time to come. There has been no screen production offered the public that has the story, the heart interest and the spectacular appeal that is in 'The Crisis'."

Sherman believes in the independent exchange. He says the time is now ripe for an independent exchange man to make money in large quantity. To show that he believes in his own advice, he will open in Chicago a large independent exchange, as well as continuing his office in New York, where he will make his headquarters. Mr. Sherman says he intends going after every masterpiece produced, regardless of size or price.

"THE WITCHING HOUR" FILMED

Frohman Amusement Corporation at Work on Picturization of Augustus Thomas' Play—C. Aubrey Smith and Helen Arnold in Cast

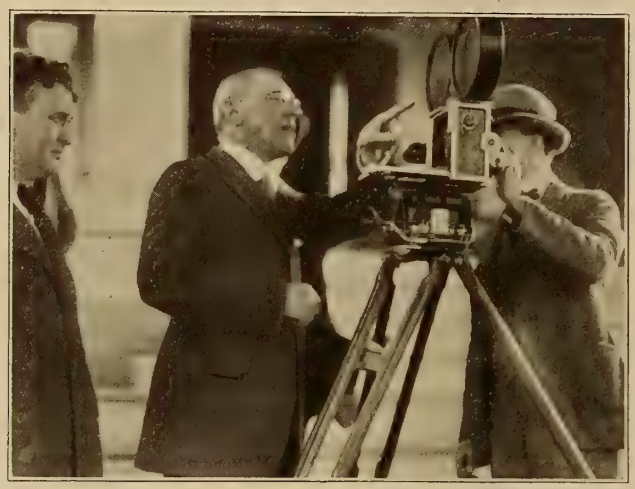
President William L. Sherrill of the Frohman Amusement Corporation recently made the statement that he can make fifty per cent better pictures producing for the independent market than he can for program release, and the unusual cast of players assembled for the forthcoming production of August Thomas' "The Witching Hour," together with the fact that nine weeks or more will be required for the completion of the work, bears out this prophesy.

In the cast of "The Witching Hour" is C. Aubrey Smith, whose work in "Jaffery" caused enthusiastic comment. Mr. Smith is dividing his time between the studio and theater, where he is rehearsing with Margaret Illington in her new play.

Jack Sherrill, who gave such an excellent account of himself in "Then I'll Come Back to You" and "The Conquest of Canaan," will be "Clap Whipple" in the Thomas play.

The role of "Viola" has been entrusted to Helen Arnold, the little Kentucky beauty. Marie Shotwell, for many years a prominent figure on the speaking stage, plays the part of Helen; while Etta De Groff, whose work in "John Glayde's Honour" and "The Woman in 47" conclusively established her, will play the part of the young mother; and Robert Conness, a leading personality on both stage and screen, plays Hardmuth.

"The conquest of Canaan," as intimated in last week's issue of MOTOGRAPHY, will be sold on a state rights basis.



A striking situation in Frohman's "The Witching Hour," featuring Jack Sherrill. Helen Arnold. C. Aubrey Smith, Marie Shotwell and Etta de Graff also carry important roles.

WILSON CONGRATULATES INCE

President Seeks Interview With Manufacturer and Praises His Production of "Civilization"—Expresses His Sympathy With Films

President Wilson has more than once shown himself an intimate student of picture progress and signified that he understood and sympathized with the aspirations of the art and industry. He has patronized great productions, and recently "Civilization" attracted his attention, and he invited Thomas Ince, the producer, to call upon him at Shadow Lawn. Mr. Wilson showed that he had an intimate knowledge of the picture "Civilization" and again and again personally congratulated Mr. Ince on his achievement. More than that, he revealed that he was interested in the technique of the work because he asked many questions with regard to the actual making of motion pictures. Mr. Ince is the first producer to be personally honored in this way by the Chief Executive of the United States.

There may be a brand-new cameraman in the business in the very near future. Here's President Wilson asking all about the infernal machine. Just a minute ago he congratulated Tom Ince, who is at the left, on his "Civilization."

When seen on the subject of his interview with the President, Mr. Ince said: "I found Mr. Wilson courtesy and affability personified. A more cordial reception I could not possibly have had."

Besides Mr. Ince, Mr. J. Parker Read, Jr., Mr. Ince's business representative, was present at Shadow Lawn and appears in some of the still pictures. These photographs are being reproduced in the newspapers throughout the United States.

"Twenty Thousand Leagues" Opens

The first public showing of the Universal production, "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," adapted from Jules Verne's wonder-story of the same name, which was held in the Studebaker Theater, Chicago, on October 9, proved to be an unusual demonstration of box-office value of timeliness and of novelty. By a remarkable coincidence, fate itself played the role of advertising manager to the film. For with every newspaper of the day headlined with accounts of German sub-sea raids, and submarine dangers the conversational subject of the hour, the attention of Chicagoans turned with keen interest to the unusual picture which promised to give them a peep below the ocean into this new battleground and, among other wonders, to show them a submarine actually torpedoing a boat. As a result, the entire theater was sold out at regular theater prices by six o'clock in the afternoon. According to Mr. Laemmle's manager, over a thousand dollars' worth of business had been turned away before the doors opened at eight o'clock.

Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Company, accompanied the production to Chicago, which he had selected for the honor of the premier showing, bringing with him members of his publicity staff and also Ernest Williamson, one of the now noted Williamson Brothers responsible for the sub-sea photography in the film. Mr. Williamson in a brief speech introduced the novel photoplay.

Special music had been arranged for the offering by Hugo Riesenfeld, directed in this first engagement by H. A. Erlinger.

The amazing fashion in which conditions in a romance which was wild fantasy half a century ago have become the stern realism of the present day is one of the things the production impresses upon the spectator in an uncanny fashion. The paradoxical situation in which one views a story where imagination has been allowed to run wild, at the same time gaining vital scientific and educational knowledge, is keenly brought home as the offering progresses. And also one appreciates the coincidence by which the picture, planned and begun more than two years ago, is finished and presented at a period when its events have made its drawing power so great.

A complete description of the production appears in the regular review department of this issue.

First of Helen Holmes Serial Oct. 23

Helen Holmes, the fearless Helen of "The Girl and the Game," and of a score of other thrilling romances of the rail, has found new—and she says bigger—perils to face in her latest photodrama, "A Lass of the Lumberlands," the fifteen-chapter, thirty-reel serial which is being filmed by Signal under the direction of J. P. McGowan for release through the Mutual Film Corporation. The first chapter goes to the screen October 23. "This picture is by far the best thing I have done yet," Miss Holmes naively confesses.

The story is big in situations and strong in characters, frankly a melodrama, but free of recourse to showy improbabilities. It treats of a topic new to the screen, the bitter war of survival forced upon the small timber holders by the giant lumber trust. From the snowy silences of the big tree forests, broken by ring of axe and crash of tree and brawl of wilderness camp, the plot's action extends out into the world of big business, on to the Capitol at Washington and finally into the precincts of the highest court in the land.

Through a series of introductory happenings shot with primal passions, the leader among the small holders, who has climbed until he has the trust kneeling to his own terms, finds himself balked and thwarted by a girl—Helen, his own daughter, though he knows it not and she is unaware of his relation to her. She has devoted her young life to the task of making this powerful man surrender back to her and her humble forest friends the lands he dishonestly took from them years before.

George W. Fawcett enacts the role of "Judge Silas Whipple" in "The Crisis." His work is wonderfully strong in every detail. Mr. Fawcett starred on the stage in "The Great John Ganton," and many other plays.

"Charity"

First Offering of Frank Powell Productions, Inc. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE reports on charitable institutions in New York read into the records by the recent Strong Investigation Committee furnished the material for the scenario on which "Charity," Frank Powell's latest offering, is based. Consequently, there is much in the picture of a very depressive nature. Scenes laid in an orphan asylum where one tooth-brush is used by a group of four or five children and a dirty refectory where the most uninviting food is served, as well as those depicting the early life of the children of a drunken, brutal man can well be imagined to have value as stimulants to move society to some action toward a correction of such frightful conditions, if they really exist.

Just what portion of the public will consider "Charity" in the least entertaining it is difficult to say. Some of the people are entertained by things which have a direct opposite effect upon others. In the same respect many will not accept the conditions existing in the asylum which "Charity" goes to such pains to make terrible, as being true to life. Some will say they are exaggerated and others that they are not, so there you are.

Laying aside the picture's possible worth as a propoganda and taking into consideration its merits as a screen drama, one to be truthful must say that "Charity" has many weaknesses in the construction of its story and the production is not up to Mr. Powell's best standard. The play opens in a court room. A woman is being tried for the murder of her baby and the counsel for the defense makes his appeal for the woman's life by having her tell the story of her life, which includes a description of the orphan asylum in which she spent a number of years.

This order of telling the story is, to our mind, not the best. As handled here it brings some confusion to the spectator, because there is no telling whether the action is a picturization of the woman's testimony or a portrayal of the story which follows the fortunes of her brother. Furthermore, it is certain that she relates incidents about which she could never have been aware. The scenario also calls for several incidents which are most improbable, as for instance, the junior partner who is apparently ignorant of the case takes up the duty of conducting the defense on a moment's notice.

An adequate synopsis of the play cannot be written here. "Charity" is the story of a girl and a boy who are taken into orphan asylum. The brother is fortunate and has the opportunity to rise in the social scale. He becomes a lawyer. But the sister continues to be buffetted about by powerful hostile influences. This is the girl who is tried for murder. The court decides that she is not to be held to the letter of the law because she would rather see her child dead than the inmate of a charitable institution such as she once lived in. There is a happy conclusion when brother and sister are brought together again.

Linda A. Griffith wrote the scenario and she enacts the role of the Girl. Creighton Hale appears as her brother. Sheldon Lewis, John Dunn, Elizabeth Burbridge, Veta Searl and Sam J. Ryan are also important members of the cast. There are other capable players in the cast. The settings and locations are fairly realistic and the photography is clear.

"A Sister of Six"

Triangle-Fine Arts Story of Southern California. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"A SISTER OF SIX" goes back to 1860 for its period and so, too, does the story go back a bit for its material. This Fine Arts offering may be considered moderately pleasing because of the acting and the true atmosphere in which the story is unfolded. The Franklins produced the picture from a scenario by Bernard McConville. The directors have given the play much that enhances it, there being some delightful pictures and they have also given the offering one or two small touches that do not mar exactly, but getting realism into a close-up of a man who has been shot by having a liquid of the consistency and appearance of blood ooze and trickle from the wound comes close to courting the spectator's keen displeasure. This was done twice in "A Sister of Six." On the other hand, it is well to remember that the directors more than twice made successful efforts to make an incident or a character strongly appealing.

Judging from various features connected with this offering it has undergone an extensive operation in the cutting room. If we accept this as true it is difficult to conclude whether or not Mr. McConville is to be criticized for the play's weaknesses and praised for its good points. Of greater interest, however, is the question of whether or not "A Sister Of Six" is good or bad. It is aged in material and treatment, this story, but certainly it will be generally accepted as a rather good feature offering. In some cases it will be spoken of even more enthusiastically than that.

Bessie Love heads the cast. Her opportunities are not abundant nor exceptional. It is more a case of one of several important parts being effectively played. Miss Love is the daughter of a New Englander who owns a grant in Southern California. Her father dies and she, with the other six children, travels East to live with an uncle. They all return in short time, the uncle having learned that gold has been discovered on the land. A band of crooks attempt to steal the land but they are foiled by the uncle and Prudence's sweetheart. There is a battle between the bandits and the rightful owners of the hacienda and help in the form of a troop of United States soldiers arrives just at the right moment for the "white" people.

Frank Bennett and Ralph Lewis contribute much to the attractiveness of the picture by splendid performances. The children who appear to such good advantage to themselves and the picture itself under the direction of C. M. and S. A. Franklin also do their share. There are other commendable members of this large cast. The photography and locations are a little bit better than good.

subject which will entertain an audience but arouse no great amount of enthusiasm. Winnifred Greenwood and Edward Coxen have the leading roles, with George Field as the villain.

The Story: Gilbert Warren (Coxen) is the honest partner of the dishonest lawyer, Arthur Fenton (Field.) Both Warren and Fenton are in love with Louise Talcott (Miss Greenwood), the daughter of a wealthy business man. Talcott, interested in the street railway franchise, requests Warren to aid him in a dishonest way. Warren, who believes that a refusal will result in a break with the Talcotts and the loss of Louise, gives the proposition thought. In the meantime, Fenton learns of the affair and plans to ruin Warren if he yields to Talcott's demands. Warren decides to be honest and refuses Talcott's request, to the chagrin of Fenton and the delight of Talcott and Louise, who were merely testing his honesty. As a result of his decision, he becomes city attorney and wins the hand of Louise.

"The Lash"

Lasky-Paramount Drama Presents Marie Doro. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IT IS a highly effective presentation the producers have given this drama by Paul West. "The Lash" is a play of admirable construction but for an impression the spectator must rely upon the manner of its enactment and visualization. A finished Lasky production, the players and true atmosphere here combine to make a good scenario into a picture that is especially pleasing.

The spectator has no difficulty in keeping his eyes focused on the screen during the unreeling of "The Lash." Convincingly portrayed characters, a smooth-running story with an amplitude of action and artistic settings make a blending whose attraction is enduring.

Marie Doro appears at her best as Sidonie, who is the daughter of the Prefect of the Island of St. Ba'tiste. This island, off the coast of Brittany, is inhabited by fisherfolk who observe many of the customs of religious bigotry of their ancestors. One of their laws provides for a public lashing of women who lower their dignity or honor. Sidonie arouses the wrath of the people by her attentions to Warren Harding an Englishman whom she nursed to health after an accident.

The villagers insist that Sidonie be lashed, but that night she elopes with Harding. She is warmly received by his fashionable set in England, but one day she sees her husband kiss a woman of long acquaintance who has brazenly invited this action on his part. Sidonie visits the woman and with her riding whip subjects her to the punishment meted out for such deeds in her native town. Then the young wife returns to the island. She is about to be lashed by the villagers when Harding arrives.

Miss Doro does the scene in which she prepares to whip the enticer of her husband in a most effective manner. Her performance throughout is effective, for that matter. Elliott Dexter, James Neill, Thomas Delmar, Jane Wolff, Veda McEvers and Raymond Hatton make up a praiseworthy cast.

James Young's direction is of a superior brand. The action is very well managed and in both the fishing village and in the views of the rugged, wave lashed shore he procured pictures from particularly good angles. The photography is typically Lasky—or in other words excellent.

"The Voice of Love"

Five-Reel American Masterpicture Released October 19. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

WINNIFRED GREENWOOD and Edward Coxen have the leading roles in this five-reel Mutual picture which Rea Berger directed from a scenario by Karl Coolidge. The original story is credited to R. Strauss. There are some unusual elements about the situations, and the story holds the interest. As a whole, however, the drama falls below the standard of American five-reelers because the plot seems artificial rather than lifelike and frequently the action lacks probability. This is in spite of a production technically good and acting which is skillful.

A word of praise is due the interior sets, which show that they were carefully planned. Since almost all the action is in interiors, this is especially important. Those showing the apartment of the astrologer-heroine are purposely over-elaborate. But with this exception, the sets are unsually beautiful and form harmonious backgrounds for the action.

George Field has a "heavy" role in the play. Laura Sears is very pleasing in an ingenue part, Violet, Marie's daughter. Others in the cast are Harvey Clark, Alfred Ferguson, Howard Crowe, John Singleton, Josephine Phillips and Rena Carlton.

The Story: Marie Osmond (Miss Greenwood) is an astrologer known professionally as Madame Thebe. Henry Winters, a lawyer, is in love with her but she refuses to marry him. She tells him of her early life and of the death of her husband. Her husband had been very jealous and she had frequently quarreled with him. One evening he threatened the life of a caller, Davis (George Field). There was a struggle, during which Marie had fainted. When she regained consciousness, she found her husband shot to death and a revolver in her own hand. Davis declared that she had fired the fatal shot. Marie had given her little daughter to strangers and had left the city, but Davis continued to blackmail her.

Later, Marie meets Philip Morse (Edward Coxen), with

"And they all lived happily ever after."

whom she falls in love. Philip meets and loves a young girl in another city, and Marie, in a jealous temper, sends Davis to break up the romance. Davis succeeds so well that he wins the girl's affection. Marie is pleased until she learns accidentally that the girl is her own daughter. Then she straightens out the tangle she has caused and reunites the young people. In the meantime the lawyer, Winters, has proved Marie's innocence of the murder and Davis's guilt, and in reward wins Marie's hand. So both love stories end happily.

"The Sultana"

Pathe Gold Rooster Play in Colors. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE SULTANA," which was produced out in California at the Balboa studios, returns from a trip to France all dressed up in colors. The Pathecolor adds materially to the picture as an attraction even if in this instance it does not add to the beauty of things. In some of the scenes the colors get into a fight with one another and we have a notion that if any eyes sensitive to what should and should not be in color scheming are in the audience they are liable to be pelted by a stray blow or two. But the exhibitor knows how well his patrons like colored films so there is no need of further discoursing here upon the box-office value of "The Sultana" so far as chromatics are concerned.

Ruth Roland is the featured player and in her support William Conklin, Edward J. Brady, R. Henry Grey, Frank Erlanger and other well known Balboa players appear. Miss Roland may be counted upon to be interesting and though the story makes her do such things as dressing and acting the part of "The Goose Girl," even to walking along the road preceded by an apprehensive group of geese, because she is a soprano and expects to sing this role some day, she is interesting and pleasing as Virginia Lowndes despite this and other handicaps.

Virginia is stopping with the Kirklands when a plot to rob a young designer of art jewelry of a priceless tiara is brought to the very doors of this wealthy and socially prominent family. The son of the house steals the tiara just to prove that he can, but things get beyond him and he is soon asking Virginia to help him out of a scrape. The count Virginia is in love with proves a villain and before the end of the play she accepts the love of a much more worth-while young man.

The story is by Henry C. Rowland. Doubtless, the author meant the play to be a farce but if he did the director and the players failed to catch his spirit. As it stands "The Sultana" is a melodrama with one of its important characters purely comic in intent but not in fact. If a story under these conditions can be called good, then "The Sultana" is good. In any event, the photography and the acting, in most cases, is superior to the story at its best.

THIS number of the Kolb and Dill series is more of an extravaganza than earlier ones, but it is full of the same clever comedy and spirited fun. Kolb and Dill are as entertaining as ever, whether in their well known garb or in Scotch Highlander costumes. Thomas Chatterton, lately hero-ing in "The Secret of the submarine," has an important role in the story and adds a full share to its entertainment value. He is at his best as the dashing "Fritz" Harold of the play. May Cloy is pleasing as the teacher-heroine, and a group of school children provide excellent comedy. The production, which Rea Burger directed, moves briskly and is interesting as well as amusing.. The story is by Aaron Hoffman, put into scenario form by Al Santell. The photography and settings are fine. The offering is fresh and wholesome, very worth while as entertainment and good enough to win any audience which likes a bit of gay frivolity.

The cast of players includes George Ahern, Clarence Burton, Harry Bernard and Charles Lynch.

The Story: When the story begins, Louie is janitor in a New York office building. He becomes interested in the experiments of a group of chemists, especially when he overhears their discussion of the possibility of making gold from baser metals. One evening he combines a number of chemicals at random but instead of producing gold, he causes an explosion which wrecks the building. Escaping with his life, he leaves New York for the little village of Solemn. He carries with him a jumbled formula from the chemists' office. In Solemn, he interests Mike, keeper of a confectionary store patronized mostly by school children. Mike finances the pseudo-scientist for a time, hoping to share in the profits of the discovery.

Just as Mike is losing faith in Louie, another stranger arrives in town, "Fritz" Harold Wainwright, motoring through in a speed contest. His car is wrecked in the village and when he meets the teacher, Claire, he lingers in the town. Claire refuses his offer of marriage, believing that he is the son of wealth and unable to win a fortune for himself. To convince her, he undertakes to demonstrate his ability. He learns of Mike and Louie and, backing Louie's formula by "bluff," advertises himself and the two old chaps, and interests a number of capitalists. When Louie's formula is put to the test, it proves to make, not gold, but puncture-proof rubber. They sell the formula and all become rich, and "Fritz" marries Claire.

"The War Bride's Secret"

William Fox Drama Featuring Virginia Pearson Released October 8. Reviewed by G. Graves

VIRGINIA PEARSON in "The War Bride's Secret" has a part which she makes the most of, emotionally, and demonstrates the wide range of her powers. She puts her whole soul into the portrayal of this role, which is that of a Scotch woman, who, believing her secretly married husband killed at war, marries another man to satisfy her parents and give a name to her unborn "bairn."

The story is a conventional one, but this does not by any means signify that it is weak. Its sub-developments, unique comedy touches, and general merits of production make the picture thoroughly engrossing and worth while. Trueness to human life and experience is a paramount consideration. The photography is good, and the sets have enough of the exotic atmosphere to suit requirements. The story was written by Mary Murillo, while Kenean Buel directed. Glen White and Walter Law take their parts well. The latter's portrayal is perhaps the best he has yet done for Fox.

Miss Pearson is Jean MacDougal, a dairy-maid on the farm of Robin Gray, a land owner. Her father, blinded by Gray's riches, favors him as his son-in-law and is highly antagonistic towards Colin Douglas, whom Jean loves. Colin secretly marries Jean, going to war shortly after. In due time word comes of his death. Jean, for the sake of her unborn child, marries Gray. The latter finally comes to a realization that his wife has no affection for him and the child becomes his sole comfort. Then comes Colin's return, Jean's heart-rending attempt to be faithful to her second husband, and at the last, Gray's noble sacrifice to Colin, for it transpires that even the child belongs to the latter, and not Gray. The pathos of Gray's unfortunate lot is fully felt.

delightful touches attached to the stellar role. The fact that some incidents lack plausibility does not perceptibly alter this entertaining value. However, it is to be regretted that such a conventional, and therefore interest-dampening, ending should have been affixed to the picture. The story was written by Channing Pollock and Rennold Wolf and scenarioized by June Mathis.

The atmosphere of "down East," with its rocky cliffs and ocean surf pervades the picture with excellent effect and illustrates the importance of correct atmosphere in a picture. The photographic art of the piece could hardly have been improved upon. Edwin Carewe's direction is for the most part very efficient.

Mabel Taliaferro has the part of "Jack," the simple, unsuspecting daughter of Miles Allen, head of a band of smugglers. She falls in love with Lang, a young customs officer, who, after the smugglers have been routed and her father killed, she naturally believes is the cause of all her misery. It is later proved, however, that the villain, her unwelcome lover, has betrayed his own people in order to discredit Lang in the eyes of the girl. The customs officer returns to explain things to "Jack," and arrives just in time to find her in a violent struggle with his rival, the betrayer. The final removal of the latter from the path of the two puts an end to their troubles.

Constituting the able support of Miss Taliaferro in this picture, are Robert Frazer, Leslie H. Stowe, Peter Lang and Martin J. Faust.

"The Car and the Girl"

Final Episode of Vitagraph's "The Scarlet Runner." Reviewed by George W. Graves

THE feature of this picture is a whizzing automobile road race, which, as far as speed and thrills go, leaves nothing to be desired. Seldom, if ever, since the beginning of pictures, have automobiles been made to do such "stunts" before the camera. At times the racers are inconsistently running slow, but for the most part there is no faking of speed. These flashes of cars traveling at high speed will entertain mostly everyone, and it hardly needs to be said that children will go into ecstacies of delight. In one case a car is made to skid around a sharp corner at a great risk to both the occupants and the camera man, who had to jump quick. The race itself, however, is a rather manufactured affair, in which chance is the pre-eminent factor, and which savors a little of old-time motoring.

Everyone knows the ability and drawing power of the two stars of this series, Earle Williams and Edith Storey, therefore it only needs to be said that they are at their best. Others in the cast are Charles Kent, Julia Swayne Gordon and Arthur Lehman. The joint efforts of Wally Van and William P. S. Earle have insured excellent direction.

Christopher's uncle assures him that it will be to his interest to win the coming road race. On the day of the race Dorothy learns that it was not Raoul, but Christopher, who gave his blood for her. As she has promised Raoul her hand if he can beat her in the race, she enters in a turbulent state of mind. An exciting moment arrives when Dorothy sacrifices her car in order to prevent the desperate Raoul from ditching Christopher. The girl then joins Christopher in the Scarlet Runner and both ride to victory.

"Prudence the Pirate"

Pathe Gold Rooster Play a Thanhouser Production. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"PRUDENCE THE PIRATE" is a distinctly pleasant farce with a stirring melodamatic climax. The story is a very light and proportionately diverting offering written by Agnes Johnson. It is the tale of an enthusiastic young girl who craves adventure and seeks it by renting a somewhat passé sailing vessel and becoming an outlaw to the extent of kidnapping her ridiculous aunt and the society idler selected for the girl to marry.

As long as Prudence develops an interest in the young man it seems needless to say that he proves himself a man when put to the test, but this is well done. We expected to see Astorbilt fight off the tough crew the girl mans her ship with; but no such thing occurred. He blossoms forth as a hero at the end when the girl is trapped in the cabin of the burning ship, which is much better.

William Parke and the cast which Gladys Hulette heads is deserving of as much if not more praise than the author of the play. We have so frequently expressed our admiration for the actress featured in "Prudence the Pirate," that there is little left to say, except, perhaps, that Gladys Hulette is her own engaging and intelligent self in this part.

Mr. Parke extracted the full worth in humor from the situations provided by the author and he with equal skill handled the melodramatic scenes. The latter moments are really quite stirring, while the picture throughout entertains one as one likes to be entertained.

Every time we see a picture like "Prudence the Pirate," we start right in to wonder that the producers do not give more attention to such really entertaining plays and observations made while visiting the picture theaters tell us that the greater portion of the public holds to the same view. Why so many harassed heroines or stupid Cinederellas when the likes of Prudence can be evolved by the scenario writer?

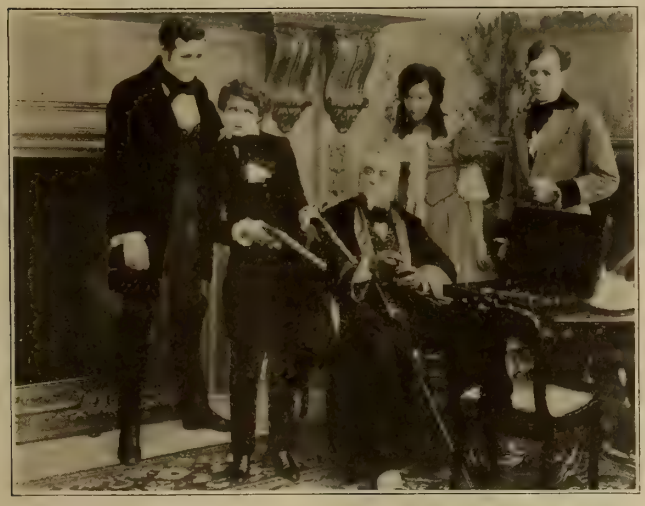
Of course, the story is most improbable, but it is good screen farce. It is replete with delightful touches that are human through suggestion instead of reproduction. Mention of these again brings to mind the fact that Mr. Parke treated his material skilfully. Also, Miss Johnson writes good scenarios.

Flora Finch, a deservedly popular comedienne, makes her own opportunities as Aunty and Riley Chamberlain is, as ever, resourceful as the butler. Barnett Parker is a satisfactory John Astorbilt and William Parke, Jr., proves himself a capable youth as Tommy. Panthus is described as the ugliest pup in the world. He is ugly enough to be attractive and Panthus will win the plaudits of the spectators.

"Her Father's Son"

Morosco-Paramount Production of Great Pictorial Beauty. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"HER Father's Son," through its wholesomeness, the striking beauty of its settings and the remarkable lighting and photography, the daintiness of the star and some splendid performances by members of the supporting cast, makes itself welcome. The tired business man and the confirmed picture-goer will like the offering, not for any depths its story is possessed of, but for the appeal it makes to the eye.



Vivian Martin masquerades as a boy a good part of the time and she makes an engaging picture all by herself in clothes that serve a better purpose in delighting the spectator than deceiving either onlooker or characters in the play. She is daintier than ever, and, too, she does some good acting upon occasions in "Her Father's Son."

The story is a comedy laid in Virginia. The play opens just previous to the Civil war, and some war scenes as well as that familiar situation showing a reception in full swing suddenly halted and disrupted by a message announcing that Virginia has seceded from the Union account for some exciting moments. Even in his flashes of war William Taylor found pretty locations to frame the action. He has carried beauty from the opening scene to the last inch of film exposed.

The story is as thin as the film itself. It tells of a rich Virginian who offers to take his brother's son into his home. The brother's child happens to be a girl, so it is necessary for Francis to don boys' attire when real want forces her to seek a home wherever it is obtainable.

Francis receives her uncle and the young West Pointer, whom she finally marries, through the agency of the author more than her appearance, which is charming and attractive but not convincingly boyish. In the last scene she is about to fight the soldier a duel. This is good sport for Francis and she enjoys the situation until things begin to grow serious; then she throws open her cloak and discloses herself dressed as a girl.

Helen Jerome Eddy has a part that is almost but not quite worthy of her native talent and artistry. Miss Eddy is a sterling actress. This she has fully proven in her numerous screen appearances. Herbert Standing, Alfred Vosburgh, Joe Massey, Lucille Ward, Tom Bates and Jack Lawton complete an adequate supporting cast. Now a word about Homer Scott; his camera work is consistently good, but in "Her Father's Son" he outdid himself. The photography is clear, sharp and rich of tone, while the lighting effects are of an excellent quality.

Vivian Martin is interesting as a boy in "Her Father's Son."

BARNEY BERNARD is a self-appointed charitable institution in "A Prince In A Pawnshop," which tells of a Jewish banker who makes the wealthy and healthy pay exhorbitant rates of interest on their notes and loans so as to be able to give freely to the needy. This five reel Blue Ribbon Feature was written by Marie de Sarlabous and Andre de Segurola and Paul Scardon directed the production. Of "A Prince In A Pawnshop" this may be said: It is well produced, Mr. Bernard gives a convincing characterization, but the story is so lacking that the picture is all of dull:

Barney Bernard in "A Prince in a Pawnshop."

The story is rather well put together, but there is nothing to it. The main character is big-hearted but the play keeps hammering away at this virtue of his until the spectator says to himself "all right, he is a charitable and therefore lovable man but why does he not do something interesting?" There is the whole thing, nobody does anything interesting, only the things that are supposed to create a strong affection in the breast of the spectator for them. If your reserve store of sympathy is abundant you may get enjoyment from "A Prince In A Pawnshop," otherwise you will be lulled to sleep by it. In vain did we wait watchfully for a bit of humor or a touch of interesting drama. Verily, "A Prince In A Pawnshop" has no "pep."

Mr. Scardon imbued his scenes with reality. In this respect the play has every advantage to succeed. But appropriate settings and good acting cannot do much with a play that is a play in name only. "A Prince In A Pawnshop" is a picture whose every scene is a loaf of sugar and after a few scenes one is fully conscious that one has been over-fed on sweets.

Garry McGarry, Bobby Connelly, Enda Hunter, Brisley Shaw and Charlotte Ives are in the cast. These players do remarkably well, with the exception of Miss Hunter. Her acting is distinctly "movie."

THE picturization made by Paragon for the World program, of the famous speaking stage success, "The Man Who Stood Still," proves to be one of the most delightfully human photoplays ever made. It is especially well adapted for the screen and Frank Crane, the director, has taken advantage of every opportunity to emphasize bits of character drawing, touches of pathos, tragedy and comedy. Tears and laughter are mingled together throughout the story. It contains comedy of the rarest sort, yet is founded on dark tragedy. It is a slice cut deep into the heart of life, depicted with sympathetic insight. Not the least of its merits is the delicacy of treatment given tragic story of the girl, only its pathos being emphasized, the sordidness kindly hidden.

The acting of the well chosen cast is excellent throughout. The work of each stands distinct, a living characterization to which the player may point with pride. First in importance in the story is Lew Fields as Herman Krause, the old jeweler who "stood still" while the world progressed. Then there is Doris Kenyon who, as Marie, the daughter, gives a wonderful portrayal of an innocent but willful girl whom fate treats cruelly. Edward O'Connor is unforgetable as MacPherson, Krause's rival and one enemy, who later becomes his friend when a common sorrow unites them. John Powers as Frank MacPherson, the blackguard son, and Dave Ferguson as Joseph, an ambitious youth who makes good, are effective contrasts. George Trimble as Otto Spiegel, Krause's friend, is excellent, while Harry Fraser as Fred, his son, has an unsually sympathetic role. Viola Trent, as Alice, his daughter, has a small but very vivid part, while not the least of the cast is Auguste Burmester, Katie, housekeeper of the Krause home.

The play is suited to any type of theater. It appeals to the emotions and will send an audience into gales of laughter, and next moment bring tears to their eyes. It has all the elements of popular appeal and is thoroughly satisfactory in every detail.

The Story: Herman Krause is a kind hearted old jeweler whose chief interest in life is his motherless daughter, Marie. He and his old friend, Otto, arrange for the marriage of Marie and Fred, Otto's son. Fred is in love with Marie, but the girl is infatuated with Frank, the unscrupulous son of MacPherson, Krause's rival. Her father objects to the affair, but the girl meets Frank secretly.

At a picnic given by her father in her honor, Marie steals away to meet Frank and to beg him to marry her. Frank agrees and they elope, but their marriage is a fake one.

Two years later, we find Krause a broken-hearted man and poor Marie and her baby deserted by Frank. Marie is cared for by the Spiegels, but her father refuses forgiveness. Then comes the revelation that the marriage was illegal. MacPherson, as grieved as Krause, begs his son to marry Marie, but Frank declares that he has a wife. Otto Spiegel turns against Marie, and her father brings her home, but refuses to forgive her or see the baby.

However, things work out to a happy conclusion when Fred, who has always loved Marie, renews his proposal of marriage. His father forgives Marie, and at last Krause, won by the baby, also forgives.

"The Iron Woman"

Nance O'Neil in Metro Picturization of Novel. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

ADAPTED from a novel by Margaret Deland, "The Iron Woman" is a six-part Metro offering from the Popular Plays and Players studio. This story, which turns about a woman of unusual strength of will and purpose, was selected because of the seemingly obvious opportunities it would furnish Nance O'Neil, the featured player. As it is a story depending strictly upon characterization, there were many obstacles for Wallace C. Clifton to surmount in writing the scenario. The scenario writer, while not successful in characterization, has not failed, for he has made the basis upon which the director and the players build six reels of mildly interesting action. There is no characterization or drama, but there is action that will hold the attention of the screen patrons.

"The Iron Woman" is laid in a mill town. Sarah Maitland capably manages the iron mills left her by her husband. She is a woman who cares little for dress; in fact, she has now few of the womanly interests. She loves her children but she has brought them up to be devoid of sentimentality. Even more than this, she would like them to be cold and distant, but they must be true and sincere as she is. It is, therefore, a great shock to her when her son Blair marries a young woman who in a rash mood breaks her engagement to David Richie. David and Blair were friends and this act on the part of her son turns her against him as much as she, a loving mother, could be turned.

There are other incidents in the play, but they are not of importance either as incidents or elements contributing to a central line of action. A series of scenes taken in a steel mill add much to the realism of the picture. Such scenes as these invariably interest the picturegoer. The other settings are good, the only fault to be found with the technical end of the production being the effect of an electric storm in the studio interiors. This was caused by some temperamental lights, which persisted in flashing up and down.

Miss O'Neil is supported by Alfred Hickman, Einar Linden, Evelyn Brent, Vera Sisson, Christine Mayo and William Postance. The direction of the piece was ably taken care of by Carl Harbaugh.

"20,000 Leagues Under the Sea"

Eight-Reel Universal Production of Jules Verne's Romance. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris.

FOR two years, Stuart Paton, director of a company of Universal players, aided by the Williamson brothers, inventors of a method of taking sub-sea motion pictures, has been at work on a picture version of Jules Verne's novel, "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea." The result, presented in eight reels, has had its first public showing in Chicago, and is now ready for general release.

The offering has two points of appeal—first, the novelty of the under-sea scenes, especially the introduction of the submarine boat and the demonstration of its methods, a timely subject; and second, the well-known and generally loved romance. In the picture version, the first element, the unusual scenery and subjects, proves the most striking feature. There are many truly remarkable pictures in the production, both entertaining and instructive. The views of a hunting expedition beneath the sea, when the men, in diving costumes, killed sharks and other great fish, aroused especial enthusiasm among the spectators. The struggles of the men against the undertow and the force of the water proved interesting, while the battle between the unarmed pearl diver and the octopus is wierd and thrilling.

One might continue to enumerate the unusual features of the picture. They make excellent advertising points for an exhibitor, who need have no fear of disappointing his patrons if he takes full advantage of the opportunities.

The story has a highly romantic plot which will prove entertaining to many. The writer's personal opinion was that this story is not presented in the most effective way, that it contained unnecessary detail, and as a result frequently dragged, but her companion, less sated with pictures than a professional reviewer, disagreed and declared that every scene was interesting.

The story is acted by well-known Universal players, Allan Holubar as Captain Nemo and Jane Gail as the "child of nature," having the most important roles. Other leading parts were given to Dan Hanlon, Edna Pendleton, Ole Jansen, Matt Moore and the child actress, Lois Alexander.

The settings, beside those under the ocean and in the submarine, depict a tropical island and a fabled East Indian city, the latter especially interesting. The photography, good throughout, is credited to Eugene Gaudio and his staff.

The Story: The period is during the Civil war in the United States. The world is terrorized by the report of a monster of the deep which destroys ships. A scientist, accompanied by his daughter and his assistants, undertakes to capture the monster. Instead, he and his party are taken prisoner by the creature, which is really a submarine boat built by a mysterious man, Captain Nemo, sailing the world in search of revenge for a wrong done him.

A party of soldiers in the war are carried out to sea by a balloon. They fall into the sea near the "Nautilus," Captain Nemo's subsea boat, and are rescued by him. Then they are put ashore on a mysterious island. On the island they meet a young girl who had been placed there when a child.

In England, Charles Denver, an adventurer, is haunted by the memory of an East Indian princess whose suicide he had caused. He sets sail in his yacht for distraction. He and his crew also arrive at the mysterious island, where the American party had begun to quarrel. One of the men plans with the Englishman to kidnap the girl.

The commander of the submarine learns that the owner of the yacht, Captain Denver, is the enemy he has been seeking. He sinks the yacht by a torpedo from the "Nautilus." He rescues the girl, who proves to be his own daughter. For he was the East Indian prince whose wife Denver had killed and whose daughter had been kidnapped and placed on the island. His vow of revenge fulfilled, Captain Nemo dies, and the girl goes back to claim her rightful inheritance, accompanied by her soldier sweetheart. The crew of the submarine abandons the "Nautilus" after burying their dead master beneath the coral banks of the ocean.

Nell Shipman-Triple Personality

To have one's ambitions flowing through three separate channels at the same time is the fate of Nell Shipman. The call of the legitimate stage has never ceased to sound in her ears. The long line of parts played behind the footlights entitle her to discuss (as she is doing now) contracts with one of the leading Broadway producers. Her screen work for the Vitagraph, Fox and Lasky Companies, where she shared honors with William Farnum, Lou Tellegen, and later was featured alone, establish her in the realms of the silent drama.

Nell Shipman, star who has written a book.

The third and most interesting side of Nell Shipman's personality is the ability not only to conceive unusual themes, but to write about them attractively, and a new novel from her pen is in its final stages of preparation and promises to be somewhat of a sensation.

In sending an autographed copy of her last book, "Under the Crescent," to a very close friend, Nell Shipman wrote: "In spite of what you find lying between the covers of this book, the truth is still in me."

Temporary Injunction Against Film

The supreme court of New York has issued a temporary injunction against William Fox and the Fox Film Corporation, prohibiting them from showing in any part of the United States, the picture entitled "The War Bride's Secret." The injunction was issued upon the petition of Herbert Brenon, who complained that the title of the picture was an infringement upon his rights as owner of the copyright of "War Brides," which he is producing with Nazimova as the star. Justice Pendleton stated that he would hand down his decision as to making the injunction permanent, in a few days. Meanwhile, the film, which has been shown at the Academy of Music, will have to be retired.

Allen J. Holubar and Leah Baird are playing together in "The Old Toymaker" at Universal City. Holubar is directing the picture.

Powerful Moss Drama

When George Bronson Howard wrote "The Follies of 1912," he had no idea that some day he was going to write one of the most serious film dramas of the times. Most of Mr. Howard's writings have been in a more or less light and humorous vein, and thousands have enjoyed his theatrical efforts as produced in collaboration with David Belasco, in his "Passing Show of 1912" and in a number of one-act plays that have been produced from time to time.

"Snobs," "The Double Cross," "The Red Lights of Mars," "An Enemy of Society," and "The Only Law" are among the most popular and well known books of this author. To those who are acquainted with him through these stories, B. S. Moss' film "The Power of Evil," by Mr. Howard, will come well recommended when it is announced that critics have pronounced this as one of that author's greatest works.

This play is a powerful arraignment of the drink evil, and the author has handled the subject from a hitherto neglected angle. That the evil must be conquered through eugenics, prohibition or birth control is patent to every one who sees the picture.

Instead of using the familiar method of pointing the harm a person does himself by drinking, Mr. Howard uses a broader and more unselfish appeal—the appeal of unborn generations whose sufferings and depravity, through hereditary taint, should be guarded against by every man with any sense of justice and fair play. Mr. Howard believes that thoughts of a daughter's ruin or a degenerate son's disgrace should accompany every desire to "take a drink."

Margaret Nicholas, who is remembered for her splendid work in "Little Mary Sunshine," plays the leading role and is supported by an all star cast in "The Power of Evil," to be released by the B. S. Moss Motion Picture Corporation in October. It is the first release under their new state right plan.

Carter De Haven, who is well known as a practical joker as he is as a comedian, sent Ford a dachshund the other day. "I am wondering how that German dog will get along with the allied bunch," Carter remarked to Wallace Beery, his director.

Horn in New York

Robert W. Horn, who for a considerable period has been traversing the United States in the interest of the Nicholas Power Company of New York, was a visitor at the New York offices of Motography last week to pay his respects. Mr. Horn returned to New York after an absence of a year and a half and his host of friends in and about Manhattan are very glad to see him again. He was the official representative of the Nicholas Power Company at the San Francisco exposition, and since has been traveling through the middle west boosting Power's 6B. He expects to spend several weeks in New York before returning to the road.

To Tour Unity Exchanges

The Unity Sales Corporation has completed arrangements for Margaret Gale, who plays the role of the persecuted heroine in "The Yellow Menace," to make a tour of the Unity Exchanges and appear on the stage of the largest theaters in the cities where "The Yellow Menace" is being exhibited. The tour will require several weeks. Miss Gale's first appearance was in the historic Boston Theater.

Loew Books "Crimson Stain"

Marcus Loew booked "The Crimson Stain Mystery" serial and presented it for the first time in Greater New York in September. In addition to this Mr. Loew states that he intends to use it in more than eighty houses that he controls throughout the country. The contracts were closed with Edward Saunders, manager of the New York Metro Exchange, through which Mr. Loew booked the picture.

"The Crimson Stain Mystery" is being presented by Consolidated Film Corporation, a new company in the field. Maurice Costello and Ethel Grandin are being presented in the principal parts.

A deal has been closed between the Mutual Film Corporation and the All Star Features Distributors, Inc., for "Purity" for the states of Colorado, Utah, Wyoming and New Mexico.

ATLANTIC COAST NOTES

Al Woods, the theatrical producer, has accepted for production in one of the Broadway theaters this season, a three-act drama written by Col. Jasper Ewing Brady, head of the Vitagraph scenario department, in collaboration with the Hon. Arthur J. Westermayer. The play was written in seven days and was first submitted to Woods, who at once accepted it.

Richard Bennett, having completed his picture work on the coast, has returned to New York to begin rehearsals for the stage play, "Zack," by Harold Brighouse

Earle Williams recently became an associate member of the New York Press Club.

Marguerite Clark, in the Famous Players picture, "Miss George Washington," is playing the part of a girl who cannot tell the truth.

Jack Pickford is rapidly qualifying for the title of the Famous Players' grouch. In the role of William Sylvanus Baxter, in "Seventeen," it is one of the chief points of his character that he detests the dog owned by Genesis, the family servant. Since the dog selected for that role took a violent fancy to Jack at first sight, Jack has to spend all his spare moments being mean to the animal in order to have it shun him before the camera.

Helen Starr, for the last year editor of the Universal eastern scenario department, has gone to the Pacific Coast to join the Universal forces there. Miss Starr has played in stock, vaudeville and the legitimate stage in addition to doing magazine and newspaper work.

Harold Entwhistle, who plays the father in the Metro production, "Love, Honor and Obey," directed by W. Christy Cabanne, was formerly a director with the California Motion Picture Corporation.

W. Christy Cabanne, who will direct the fourteen-episode serial in which Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne will be starred for the Metro program, brought his own personal staff of assistants with him from California to New York. Eugene Thurston will be his assistant director; R. J. Huntington, his business manager; Millie Richter, film cutter, and William Fildew, cameraman. They have already assisted him in the production of "Love, Honor and Obey," a five-reel photodrama in which Frances Nelson is the star.

Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady, head of the Vitagraph scenario department, has written a book, "The Big Chief," which will shortly be published by the Britton Publishing Company.

Henry Hull, who attracted favorable attention on the speaking stage in the leading role of "The Man Who Came Back," at the Playhouse, will make his first appearance in pictures in the World production, "The Honor of the Waynes," in which Robert Warwick is starred .

The Loew and the Proctor circuits have booked "The Prima Donna's Husband," handled by the Herald Film Corporation, for their theaters.

The roof-garden of the Hotel Astor, New York, is shown in the cafe and cabaret scenes of William Christy Cabanne's first offering on the Metro program.

Hattie Delano, who appeared in "The Quitter," "The Upheaval," and other Metro productions, will play the part of the housekeeper in "The Sunbeam," the Metro-Rolfe feature play chosen for Mabel Taliaferro as a successor to "The Dawn of Love."

The Shaker play, "The Gates of Eden," in which Viola Dana will soon appear on the Metro program, was written by a clergyman, Rev. William E. Danforth, now of Indianapolis, but formerly of Chicago. Mr. Danforth has made a life-long study of Shakerdom. John H. Collins is directing the production.

Frank Dazey, who with his brother, Charles T. Dazey, wrote "The Flower of Faith," the second of the Golden Eagle features of the International Film Service,, Inc., is soldiering on the Texas border, a prominent member of the Squadron A of the New York militia.

Pierre Le May, leading man in Metro productions, has arranged to appear in a Broadway stage production which will not necessitate his leaving New York. He gave up a prominent role in one of Willard Mack's new plays, when he found that he would have to go to Chicago, where the play will have its premiere. He will now be able to continue his work on the screen during his New York engagement.

Wilfred North has recovered from the injuries received in the automobile accident in which he and Lillian Walker and other Vitagraph players were overturned, and is again at the studio directing Miss Walker's next picture.

Peggy Hyland is working in an Arthur Train drama of the Civil War period, under the direction of Paul Scardon, with Antonio Moreno.

Bertram Bracken, director of a number of Fox plays, has been engaged to direct for the Lewis J. Selznick enterprises.

Alan Hale has joined the Fox players.

Louise Huff recently drove a racing roadster straight up onto the porch of a rural parsonage, taking one of the porch pillars with her. She wrecked the car and nearly killed Robert G. Vignola, her director, and Nat Deverich, his assistant, who were sitting on the porch. It was an elopment scene for the Famous Players adaptation of "Seventeen."

Two young women from Pittsburgh, Florence Curry and Rowena Rossiter, winners of a contest conducted by the Pittsburgh Press, arrived at the Vitagraph studios for try-outs as picture players. When the Pitsburgh Press produces its motion picture play, "Man and Millionaire," these young ladies will head the cast.

Mme. Petrova is the author of two of the Metro plays in which she has appeared, one, "The Weaker Sex," recently

North American Film Corporation—The management anticipates a big business in the sequel to "The Diamond from the Sky," which will probably be released within the next sixty days. The profits derived from this additional business will go to the holders of the common stock. Speculation as to the total dividends expected on the common varies from $60 to $90 per share.

Lone Star Corporation—Reports of business show the Charlie Chaplin films are in as great demand as ever. Considerable trading is being done in both preferred and common stocks. It has been stated, on reliable authority, there is a book value of $74 per share on the common if no further contracts are taken.

Triangle Film Corporation—Stockholders will perhaps see a ray of hope for dividends in the latest move of the management to distribute its pictures through private exchanges, as announced last week, although none is promised or even suggested. While stock sales are reported on the New York Curb daily, there has been very little change in the market during the last few weeks.

New York Motion Picture Corporation—Stock in small lots is freely offered with few bids and there seems to be a tendency toward lower prices.

Paramount Pictures Corporation—All of the various distributing interests and companies that go to make up the Paramount program are now under one general policy, so that Paramount at present represents a cohesive unit in the film industry.

It has been stated in Eastern papers that D. W. Griffith will abandon the film game and hereafter exercise his talents in legitimate drama. Mr. Griffith feels that censorship has very seriously curtailed the normal growth of the Motion Picture business. He is also quoted as saying there seems to be no "middle ground"—a picture either commands 5, 10 and 15 cents or $2, and this does not represent a satisfactory condition.

Mae Marsh and Robert Harron are working in the Fine Arts production, "The Wharf Rat," under the direction of Chet Withey. Mae Marsh has the role of an orphan girl who runs away from her stepmother and becomes a wharf rat. CHICAGO GOSSIP

Harry Dunkinson will soon be seen in a new 2-act Essanay comedy for which he furnished the idea. The corpulent commedian has been an ardent swimmer all summer and he conceived a comic plot on a none too efficient nor intrepid lifesaver who saves no lives but gets a lot of credit. The picture is entitled, "The Lifesaver."

One of George Ade's funniest fables in slang has just been filmed by Essanay. It is "The Fable of the Kittenish Superanns and the World-Weary Snipes," and appeared but a short time ago in the Cosmopolitan Magazine. It contrasts the enjoyment gotten out of life by a group of persons above middle age, who dance and frolic with childish abandon, while the debutantes and their young men gaze upon all amusement with a bored, tired manner. It gave President George K. Spoor of Essanay such a good laugh that he decided to offer it in two reels instead of the customary one.

It's the boy who is stage-struck now, and not the girl, according to Bryant Washburn of Essanay. This star's daily mail convinces him of this. He declares that in a recent count more than one hundred letters were received from boys anxious to break into pictures, as against twenty girls similarly ambitious.

Warda Howard and her husband, John Lorenz, have left Chicago for New York. They have completed their engagements with the Essanay Company.

The first step toward a memorial fund for the late James Whitcomb Riley, was taken at Indianapolis, Ind., in September, when the centennial motion picture "Indiana," filmed by the Selig Polyscope Company was shown for the benefit of the memorial fund. The picture "Indiana" is in seven parts and was produced for the Interstate Historical Pictures Corp. James Whitcomb Riley is one of the principal characters in the picture, since the scenes depicted are supposed to be a reinactment of the story as it is told by the poet to a group of children.

Mayor William Hale Thompson loaned his yacht, "Tringa," to Essanay for use in a picture, the three-reeler, "Marooned."

The Selig Athletic series is being released through Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay service.

Mary Charleson, whose most recent appearances have been in Selig features, is now with the Essanay Company, playing the leading feminine role opposite Henry B. Walthall in "The Truant Soul," from the novel by Victor Rousseau.

John Cossar has a comedy part as the father of four daughters who become simultaneously engaged, in "The Chaperon."

Marguerite Clayton wears the attire of a messenger boy in "The Heart of Virginia Keep," a three-act Essanay.

Harry Dunkinson, who appears as a tramp in "Easy Ed," a two-act Essanay comedy, played a tramp character on the speaking stage for twelve years, in "At the Old Cross Roads."

Scenes for "The Truant Soul" will be taken in the hill country of Wisconsin, near Richland Center. In this feature Walthall will play the role of a world-famous surgeon who has a serious weakness. A mystery plot runs through the story, not solved until the final scenes.

E. H. Calvert has demonstrated his ability as a golfer by winning the Fellowship cup in the club tournament of the Westmoreland Country Club. This is the third cup he has won this year.

Complete Record of Current Films

Believing the classification of film pictures by the nature of their subjects to be of greater importance to the exhibitor than classification by makers, MOTOGRAPHY has adopted this style in listing current films. Exhibitors are urged to make use of this convenient tabulation in making up their programs. Films will be listed as long in advance of their release dates as possible. Film manufacturers are requested to send us their bulletins as early as possible. Reasonable care is used, and the publishers cannot be responsible for errors.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

Vogue-Mutual funny ones. At the left, "Ducking a Discord;" at the right, "Her Painted Pedigree;" in the center, no play at all, just Ben Turpin and Paddy McQuire in a very serious pose.

General Program

The White Rose of the Wilds—Biograph—October 16.—Featuring Blance Sweet and Wilfred Lucas. An unsuccessful old gold-miner is stricken down and dies, leaving three young children to take care of themselves. They are a boy of seventeen, a girl of sixteen, and a girl of eleven. The boy, inheriting his father's determination, insists that they remain, for he is sure there is gold to be found. Later his efforts are rewarded, and he rushes off to the agent to file his claim. While he is away a trio of thugs break into the cabin, but the pure, innocent girl so impresses one of them that he drives the other two off. To him she is as a white, unsullied rose blooming here in the wilderness. Her clear eye of innocence awakens his better self and he goes, asking if he may return when he has proved himself worthy.

Only a Rose—(Three Reels)—Sēlig—October 16.—Featuring Robyn Adair and Virginia Kirtley. A review will appear in next issue.

When Mrs. Stafford hears of Duncan's promotion at West Point and sends Bert there. A year later the cadets are shown preparing for their dance and Bert resents being compelled to take orders from Duncan or Duncan's friend, Dumble. The night of the dance Bert becomes furious when he sees Sylvia talking with Duncan and bent on revenge he gets old Duncan drunk in order to humiliate Duncan. Bert insults Duncan and he knocks Bert down. Duncan and his friends are suspended, but later are reinstated when facts become known, and Sylvia marries Duncan.

Dreamy Dud in the African War Zone—Essanay—October 18.—This is another split reel in which Cartoonist Carlson has worked out his humorous incidents by combining, through excellent double exposure his human figures with his well-known pen and ink characters, Dreamy Dud, Dunk (Harry Dunkinson) and the dog put out to sea. The captain orders the cook to quit boiling cabbage. The cook produces an alibi and Dunk's cigar is found to be the offensive smell. Before the captain can finish his argument a battleship opens fire on them, the gunners having orders to get the fat fellow. Dud and the dog delight in Dunk's dodging of fourteen-inch shells. Then a gigantic whale lifts the three off the boat and sends them whirling into space, Dud coming down right through a newspaper in which a cannibal chieftain is reading the latest movie news. "Spoila picture Hank Walthall," says the chief angrily. Dud is chased over the desert and caught, but the chief's daughter pleads for his life. He awakes to find the colored washerwoman telling him to get up, while Dunk and the dog laugh. Five hundred feet of scenic share the reel.

Marooned—(Three Reels)—Essanay—October 21.—Featuring Edward Arnold and Alice McChesney. Nina Holliday gets a chance to experience the unconventional situations she puts in her novels. She goes on a yacht cruise with Rupert Elliot, millionaire. Under the influence of drink Elliot makes bold advances and John Prentiss, a sailor, saves her. The yacht catches afire and Prentiss, plunging overboard to rescue the girl, finally gets her ashore on a rocky island. Unknown to them, the others of the party are saved. They write their names and the location of the isle on a piece of paper and place it in a bottle, casting it out to sea. Weeks pass and the strong John Prentiss finds himself in love with the girl. She, also, begins to love the stalwart seaman. Capt. Bruce of Elliot's yacht discovers the bottle in the hands of fishermen and a relief expedition is started. Prentiss is not to be found when the yacht reaches the island. Elliot refuses to recognize the simple marriage contract which the girl tells him exists between herself and the sailor. He takes her aboard the yacht. Under cover of darkness as the yacht prepares to steam away the girl leaps over the side and swims back to her husband.

The Greater VITAGRAPH

Complete Program Now Available Through Vitagraph—V-L-S-E

GREATER Vitagraph aims not only to provide offerings that will outstrip the general output of the field, but, also, to supply exhibitors with a type of service which will make it easier and more profitable for them to operate their businesses.

As one of the preliminary steps in this direction, Vitagraph announces the release, through V-L-S-E of

THE BIG "V" COMEDIES

These are mints of merriment of one reel, featuring the famous Hughie Mack and his company of money-getting, crowd-winning cohorts, as well as other comedy stars of like drawing power—each film fully worthy of the Greater Vitagraph name.

The first of these releases, "Walls and Wallops," will be available on November 13, to be followed by one each week.

The release of these comedies through V-L-S-E now makes it possible for exhibitors to book through this organization, a complete program each week, including:

A Blue Ribbon Feature in Five or More Parts
A Super Serial in Two Parts
A Big "V" Comedy in One Part

Other short subjects will be added to this program, to the end that exhibitors may obtain with a single effort, an entire program of equal standard—that standard representing the apotheosis of photoplay production in all its phases.

TRIANGLE

RELEASES FOR WEEK OF OCTOBER 22

H. B. Warner in "The Vagabond Prince"

KAY-BEE

Little need be said of the popularity—and drawing power—of the TRIANGLE PLAYS in which H. B. Warner has starred. Most exhibitors know that the reputation which this star acquired on the stage has been more than lived up to on the screen.

And when you have seen "The Vagabond Prince" you will again see why this is true. You will understand the difference between this play and others. You will see why Warner can take the part of Prince or an Indian beggar with equal success.

In this latest picture Warner does take the part of a foreign Prince, who, tiring of the pomp and pettiness of his father's domain, ventures out in the great world to seek adventure and forget court etiquette. You'll enjoy it—and so will your patrons.

Norma Talmadge in "Fifty-Fifty"

FINE ARTS

A TRIANGLE PLAY with Norma Talmadge as the star is sure to be a success, and this latest picture is no exception. Based on the "sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander" idea and the necessity for compromise in a happy marriage this play is not a preachment. It moves along swiftly with a rapid-fire, deeply engrossing action that will appeal to every person who is married—or ever intends to be.

Keystone Comedies Two as good as ever this week

The striking situation in Eschmann's "The Witching Hour" in which Clay (Jack Sherrill) shows Viola (Helen Arnold) and Jack (C. Aubrey Smith) that he can "look at the cat's eye." Marie Shotwell and Vita De Graff are also in the picture.

Association to Standardize Fire Laws

FILM INDUSTRY STARTS CAMPAIGN IN CO-OPERATION WITH SAFETY EXPERTS

TO WORK for the improvement of all phases of the motion picture theater is the aim of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry. The latest subject to which the members turned their attention is a widespread campaign to standardize the fire laws all over the country and so safeguard the patrons of all theaters. This will apply to the legitimate houses as well as to the picture houses.

All of the cities will aid and in the very beginning these centers of large population will be called upon to aid in the vast work, forming, as it were, an epistolary conference of cities:

Albany, Atlanta, Baltimore; Birmingham, Boston, Bridgeport, Buffalo, Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Columbus, Dayton, Denver, Detroit, Fall River, Grand Rapids, Hartford, Indianapolis, Jersey City, Kansas City, Los Angeles, Louisville, Lowell, Memphis, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, Nashville, Newark, New Haven, New Orleans, Oakland, Omaha, Paterson, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Portland, Providence, Richmond, Va., Rochester, St. Louis, St. Paul, Salt Lake, San Antonio, San Francisco, Scranton, Seattle, Spokane, Syracuse, Toledo, Trenton, Washington, D. C., Worcester, Mass.

The Association has secured the best technical, civic and legal direction obtainable. The movement was set well in motion recently when Fire Commissioner Robert Adamson of New York addressed the Fire Prevention Regulations and Insurance Committee, of which Jesse Lasky of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation is the chairman. He told of the splendid co-operation he has received from the motion picture exhibitors and others in the industry in making safe the manufacture, the storage, the transportation and the exhibition of film. The average theater, he declared, is safer than the average home, through the ready co-operation of the managers, and from the splendid way in which the motion picture interests are working with him all of the houses ultimately must reach the high merit mark. He complimented the Association on its purpose to standardize the fire laws of the country governing all indoor places where people gather for amusement.

Personnel of Fire Committee

The Fire Prevention Regulations Committee, with Mr. Lasky as chairman, is made up as follows: J. E. Brulatour, Eastman Film, New York; Wm. L. Sherrill, Frohman Amusement Corporation, New York; S. H. Trigger, Tremont Theater, New York; L. L. Levin, Regent Theater, Brooklyn; Alfred Hamburger, Chicago, Ill.; A. S. Levino, Arrow Film Corporation; Morris Choynski, M. P. E. L., Chicago; Judge A. P. Tugwell, Los Angeles; Thomas Furniss, Duluth; Mr. Flintham, manager, Kansas City Paramount Company, Kansas City; S. A. Lynch, Atlanta, Ga., and Asheville, N. C.; Ernest Horstman; Boston, Mass.; Stanley Massbaum, Philadelphia; Guy Wonders, Baltimore; C. W. Deming, John A. Eckert Company; J. H. Hallberg, New York; Charles Martyne Miscay, secretary and treasurer of the Insurance Press; A. C. Carruthers, second vice-president of the Safety Engineering, New York; L. S. Skerrett, general manager, Nicholas Power Company, New York, and Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y.

Executive Committee Elected

At its last meeting an executive committee was elected with Mr. Biscay as chairman. Others on the committee are: Maurice Choynski, Samuel H. Trigger, L. S. Skerrett, John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual Film Corporation; William Sistron, Arthur James and J. E. Brulatour. His high connection with the insurance business makes the aid and direction of Mr. Biscay almost invaluable. He has important connections in every city of the country and is a power in his particular sphere. The Association has also a distinguished expert in the person of its executive secretary, Frederick H. Elliott, who, coming fresh from a highly successful experience, is one of the best informed authorities on fire prevention in America.

As the executive secretary and founder of the Safety First Federation, he has established Fire Prevention Day, which is observed on October 9 of each year. The traffic regulations as operated under the semaphore system were devised by Mr. Elliott. All of the cities will be brought into the consideration and the debate of the general fire prevention.

From his recent association with them in safety first organization Mr. Elliott is assured of the immediate aid and advice of Dewey C. Bailey, manager of safety, Denver, Colo.; Albert A. Carroll, director of public safety, Grand Rapids, Mich.; Harry C. Davis, assistant director of safety, Philadelphia, Pa.; Frank Hague, director of public safety, Jersey City, N. J.; H. P. James, director of public safety, Dayton, Ohio; George S. LaBarre, commissioner of public safety, Trenton, N. J.; Harold W. Newman, commissioner of public safety, New Orleans, La.; J. C. Newton, director of public safety, Toledo, Ohio; Walter W. Nicholson, commissioner of public safety, Syracuse, N. Y.; A. B. Sprosty, director of public safety, Cleveland, Ohio.

Adamson Assures Assistance

Fire Commissioner Adamson assured the motion picture industry that he would, in the general movement to safeguard life and properly, give all of the assistance in his power, even putting at the special disposal of the Association one of the most highly qualified experts in his department. Mr. Adamson's remarks were listened to with the closest interest and he answered several querries put to him by producers and exhibitors. He was introduced by President William A. Brady.

"There has recently been developed two great industries," said Mr. Adamson, "and yours is one of the greatest—if not the greatest. It comes in close contact with the fire department in the making and the exhibiting of film. It is well recognized that there is a certain degree of fire hazard attending the storage and the exhibition of film. But in no other industry has a greater degree of co-operation been given than has come from the picture men.

"The regular theater building—I am not speaking of the motion picture houses now as a class—is the safest place in New York. This is so because of the attention given to proper safeguards by the managers themselves. Very often complaints come to my department regarding theaters, but they are usually entirely unfounded. I have said that as a matter of fact the theater is a much safer place than the usual home. The motion picture industry is now and has been growing enormously and these safety conditions, if not already existent, are now being made.

"What actions we have been taking might at times appear stringent, but it is based on report of the Board of Underwriters and other qualified authorities actuated and intended to mimimize dangers and to create a general safeguard. What is most needed is what you have come here to consider and what has been so well expressed by Mr. Brady. Nothing is more desirable and helpful than to standardize the fire law and to do any other thing that would prevent friction between the fire department and the members of the industry. The greatest trouble that has arisen regarding safety regulations has been due to the lack of uniform standards. To make definite what is to be done and to establish co-operation between the industry and the department is the wise and inevitable action and I will take this occasion to say that we have had splendid co-operation up to the present. We have tried to do our duty without severity. Your work will result in the greatest benefit. I can bring you in touch with men more technically qualified than myself who can deal with all points of your purpose more intelligently and efficiently than I.

"I am very glad to express my gratification for the co-operation I have received from your great industry."

Exhibitors of Northwest Meet

At a meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors of the Northwest held on October 9, Secretary William Koenig reported on a short talk he had with Thomas Furniss in which the matter of securing new members had come up. Mr. Furniss recommended that the exhibitors of the three large cities, Minneapolis, St. Paul and Duluth, be induced to join the association immediately and after that he believed the country exhibitors would fall in line. Plans were discussed for securing the Twin City exhibitors, and it was decided to wait until the exhibitors had a chance to reply to the last official letter mailed them. James Gilosky and J. B. Reisman volunteered to visit the St. Paul exhibitors and a committee will be appointed to approach the Minneapolis members. F. E. Nemec was requested to bring in new members from his section of the state, which he promised to do. The secretary was instructed to write a letter to the vice presidents of each state, asking them to co-operate with the executive board by calling on the neighboring exhibitors and bringing them into the organization.

Hamlin was requested to emphasize the $500 to $1,500 state tax, which will come up again before the legislature at the coming session, and to explain to the outside state exhibitors that should such tax be passed upon the Minnesota exhibitor, the other states will most likely pass the same law.

Club Takes Up Express Question

Another large and enthusiastic gathering marked the regular meeting of the F. I. L. M. Club of Chicago, held on October 11.

Letters were sent out during the week previous to the meeting to the general managers of the different express companies, requesting that they have their representatives at this meeting in order to discuss several questions pertaining to the shipment of films.

All the express companies responded, but matters were held in abeyance until luncheon had been served and short talks were made by Carl Laemmle and Aaron Jones, who attended the meeting as guests.

After luncheon Mr. Proctor, manager of the Metro Chicago office, was called upon to explain to the express companies the many complaints which the film exchange managers had, such as delayed shipments, discourteous treatment from employes, delays in returning C. O. D.s, and he suggested that the express companies establish a film department wherein to keep all records and information pertaining to the shipment of films, so that they would be in position to answer questions regarding shipments without delay.

The representatives of the different express companies were united insofar as giving assistance to the different exchanges was concerned. They took the matter of the film department under advisement. This radical step was not within their power to act upon, although they signified their intention of reporting favorably on the matter and would give the F. I. L. M. Club an answer at the latter's meeting two weeks later.

Numerous suggestions were made on both sides for the betterment of conditions and there is no doubt but what a decided improvement will be noticed in the handling of films as a result of this meeting.

It is the intention of the F. I. L. M. Club to take up, at each meeting, one specific item such as the above and to thoroughly discuss it with the different persons interested, giving full opportunity for the exchange of ideas, so that Chicago will stand pre-eminent insofar as co-operation and initiative are concerned.

The membership of the F. I. L. M. Club has grown so that it was necessary to take steps at this meeting to secure larger quarters, and a committee was appointed to arrange with the Morrison Hotel so that the next meeting of the club will be held there.

The other speakers at the meeting were I. Van Ronkle of the Blue Bird Company, J. Freidman of Celebrated Players, Mr. Brochell, of Paramount, and several others who brought out different points for the consideration of the express officials.

The matter of pick-up service is now in the hands of the executive committee of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League and they held a special meeting on October 13 to discuss it further.

Director Rex Ingras has under production a five-reel photodrama at Universal City entitled "The Reward of the Faithless."

PROSPECTIVE ILLINOIS OFFICIALS EXPRESS VIEWS TO MOTOGRAPHY

IN order to bring out an expression of their attitude toward the ever-present question of film censorship, MOTOGRAPHY has communicated with the candidates for the various offices in the state of Illinois asking them to give in writing statements of their convictions. Some were found to be absolutely at sea regarding the subject, knowing pictures and the questions involved only in a very hazy way indeed. Many, however, have well-founded views on the subject and others are investigating with the intention of declaring themselves later.

We give here some of the candidatal convictions.

"Better Censor Churches"

Belvidere, Ill., October 17, 1916.

Better have a censorship over the churches and a commission to see that the sermons are unobjectionable. Also might regulate congressmen and censor their speeches.

The rage for commissions to regulate everything and to provide offices for "deserving politicians" is a howling farce.

—Charles H. Fuller, Republican candidate for Congress, Twelfth Congressional district, Illinois.

Chicago, October 17, 1916.

Prior to the receipt of your letter I had given the matter of censorship but little consideration. I have since endeavored to inform myself by consultation with those who had given the matter much thought and by reference to magazine discussions. From this information and such study as I have been able to give the subject, I have reached the conclusion that regulation of motion pictures by a board constituted by the State is objectionable for many reasons, and that censorship may well be left to the general public, which by withholding its patronage, can effectually kill an objectionable film.

—Wm. J. Stapleton, Democratic candidate for State Senator Sixth District.

Refused to Vote for State Censorship

Aurora, Ill., October 14, 1916.

I am not in the habit of making pre-election pledges, but as I refused to vote for a state censorship bill in the last session of the legislature, I do not object to stating that I have not changed my mind. Such legislation would create useless offices, add more taxation to our citizens already too highly taxed, and would not, as far as I can see, be of any protection or value to the public.

—Harold Kessinger, Republican candidate for State Senator, Fourteenth Senatorial district, Illinois.

Peoria, Ill., October 16, 1916.

I am pleased to state that I am not in favor of the proposal to establish federal censorship over motion pictures, but am willing to leave that question for the states or communities to determine.

—Claude U. Stone, Democratic candidate for Congress, Sixteenth Congressional district, Illinois.

Public the Real Censors

Robinson, Ill., October 16, 1916.

In answer to yours of October 13, I will say that it has always been my idea that the general public were the real censors of all sorts of entertainment, and while I would have no voice if elected, in state matters, yet I am glad to express this opinion to you.

—Harry C. Ferriman, Republican candidate for Congress, Twenty-third Congressional district, Illinois.

Chicago, October 16, 1916.

Replying to your letter relative to laws regarding regulation of motion pictures, I beg to advise you that there are enough laws at the present time to cover this business, and all they need is proper enforcement.

—Frank Sullivan, Republican candidate for Representative in Congress, Eighth Congressional district.

Chicago, October 16, 1916.

In reply to your letter on motion picture censorship, I think there is enough censorship if they want to enforce the law.

—Edward Wulz, Republican candidate for State Representative in the Twenty-seventh Senatorial district.

Pittsfield, Ill., October 14, 1916.

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 13th inst., and to say in reply that Mr. Williams is out of town, engaged in his campaign for re-election, and will be absent almost continually until the election. However, if I have opportunity, I will call his attention to your letter, which I assure you he will be pleased to give proper attention.

—E. M. Mayo, secretary to Wm. E. Williams, Democratic candidate for the office of Congressman-at-Large, Illinois.

Exhibitors League Endorses Lowden

Oregon, Ill., October 17, 1916.

Your letter of Ocotber 10 is received in the absence of Colonel Lowden, who is at present touring the state under the auspices of the State Central Committee. It will not be possible to bring your communication to his attention for some time, but upon his return I will see that it is immediately placed before him.

For your information, I may say that as a result of an extended interview between Colonel Lowden and several members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, the League have heartily endorsed the candidacy of Colonel Lowden for Governor. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League also issued a circular letter to their members, asking that Colonel Lowden's films be run in theaters affiliated with the organization.

—G. D. Sutton, secretary to Frank O. Lowden, Republican candidate for Governor of Illinois.

Aledo, Ill., October 16, 1916.

I am a candidate for congress and, as I take it, this is a question that has to do only with state matters, and hence my opinion would not be of value to you.

—W. J. Graham, Republican candidate for Congress, Fourteenth Congressional district, Illinois.

Forum Film in Forty Houses

"The Government in Action," the film showing President Wilson and his cabinet members at work, produced by the Motion Picture Forum Company of New York, and introduced into film circles by Samuel Spedon, has been presented in something over forty Chicago theaters and in other houses in the surrounding territory. Mr. Spedon had planned on leaving Chicago for the east on October 14 but was called to Ohio to promote the government film in the larger cities of that state.

New Film Service

The Strand Film Service, a new entry into the ranks of the film exchanges, has been organized by Al Posen and Bob Millstein, both well known in the trade. Offices have been opened in the Gaiety Theater building, Broadway and Forty-sixth street, New York. The new company will embark on a policy of acquiring only pictures of proven merit, and facilities have been arranged providing for a thorough system of distribution to local exhibitors.

Clothed in a dress of most attractive colors and filled with stories that are far superior and more attractive than ever before, Picture Progress, Paramount's monthly magazine, when it makes its Yuletide debut among the magazines of the country will create a real sensation. H. I. Day is editor.

Ince at Work Again

Predicting that a new and greater era of prosperity in the motion picture industry is at hand, Thomas H. Ince, producer of Triangle-Kay Bee plays, has returned to Los Angeles to resume his duties as director-general of the half-million dollar plant at Culver City. The arrival terminated an absence of nearly five months, during which time he investigated conditions of the business in New York, Chicago, and other big cities of the East.

That the public is not tiring of motion picture plays, but, on the other hand, is daily becoming more firmly attached to them strikes the keynote of Ince's remarks concerning his trip. He left Los Angeles last May primarily to direct the national showing of his peace spectacle "Civilization," but for the past two months has been devoting a considerable portion of his time to directorial conferences affecting the affairs of the Triangle Film Corporation.

"I have heard all these rumors about the motion picture industry being on the toboggan, and I cannot say too emphatically that they are absolutely without foundation. This talk about theaters closing down all over the country is twaddle, too. Of course, the cry of the public is for good plays, and always will be, but that is just what we are trying to supply. And only those unscrupulous producers who are willing to foist inferior entertainment upon the public will pass into oblivion. The day is coming, I think, when comparatively few concerns will be providing all of America's screen entertainment. We are going to continue the making of Triangle plays, as before, and our aim will remain that of giving the public the best that money and brains can create."

Kate Price a Vim Star

Those who have followed the fortunes of Vitagraph and its stars from its early beginnings will remember Kate Price, the laugh-making star who has twinkled for seven years in Vitagraph productions.

Her most recent appearance was with Fatty Arbuckle, the Triangle comedian, in the "Waiters' Ball," in which she shared the heavyweight honors with Arbuckle himself.

Immediately after her work in this picture was concluded, she was signed on a long time contract with Vim productions to star with "Babe" Hardy, Vim comedian, and Raymond McKee in Vim comedies released on the General Film service.

Raymond McKee is another newcomer to the Vim staff with a record for ability. He was formerly with Lubin, then with the Edison Co. His last picture was with Emily Stevens in a Metro release.

Irene Fenwick with Famous

Irene Fenwick, celebrated stage star who is now appearing in "The Guilty Man," has been engaged by the Famous Players Film Company and will be starred by that concern in "Princess Zim Zim," on the Paramount program, with Owen Moore playing opposite. Miss Fenwick is one of the most popular and most talented stars on the stage today and has already demonstrated her remarkable ability on the screen.

The record of Irene Fenwick on the stage is an enviable one. To trace only a few of her accomplishments, there is "Hawthorne of the U. S. A." in which she played opposite Douglas Fairbanks, "Along Came Ruth," in which she played the title role with great success, "The Song of Songs," in which she scored a great personal hit—and now "The Guilty Man," which has again proved her to be a supreme actress.

Lambert Hillyer, well known as a short-story writer and author of many scenarios, has arrived at the Ince-Triangle studios to take up his duties as one of the staff authors of Triangle-Kay Bee plays.

Screenshine

By Mel Ody

MERELY A MATTER OF FORM ANYWAY

A SOUTH CAROLINA exhibitor writes us and mentions that his clientele was of the very highest class until lately, when both men and women bathers have gotten into the habit of dropping into the house in their bathing costumes when going to and from the beach. Oh, well, if the suits are anything like those that are scene on Chicago's beaches probably their wearers feel the need of a screen.

HAIL THE PROSPEROUS EXHIB

Sam Trinz, one of Chicago's big picture shooters, saw the note in last week's Screenshine about the Ohio exhibitor who is now exhibiting a ten-pound baby boy, and it set him going. Standing in front of his Covent Garden, where he is growing a fine crop of greenbacks, he said: "Now look at that woman carrying a dog! Wouldn't that get your goat? Why don't they raise kids? Say, you ought to see my kid. Finest baby that ever clawed his dad's necktie. Wisht I had a dozen! We offer the latter statement as bearing out the truth of our mention relative to the crop Sam is growing at his Garden, and other places.

IN WHICH SAM PROVES HE'S NOT A FISH

Sam Spedon and us were lunching at the College of Sin.

"What did you leave Vitagraph for, Sam?" we said.

"Well," said Sam, "Vitagraph got afflicted with corporationitis and I was afraid it might be contagious."

"Hooked up with anything yet, Sam?"

"No, I ain't found the right bait."

Which proves that Sam is neither a bull head nor a sucker.

You wouldn't mind making a little trip of 20,000 miles in order to make a few bookings for your houses, would you? That's how the Australian manager who dropped into Chicago last week runs things. And at that he was so modest that none of the watchful waiters of the exchanges remembered his name. This live exhib with the kangaroo spirit runs three houses in Sidney—and he runs 'em.

SUES FOR RIGHT TO LAFF

Fred Rogers likes to laugh. And when he sees a good film comedy he shakes the foundations of the house. He dropped into his home town theater at Orangeton, New York, the other night and about as soon as the ticklefillum began to run Fred began to shake. Then he hollered. Then he roared. And the earth shook. Finally, the manager put him out to save the underpinning of the house. The next day Fred swore out a complaint against the manager, charging that he has a right to laugh when and how he wants to. We shall watch the trial with great interest.

THE ORIGINAL LEMON SQUEEZER

Emil Meyer of the Broadway Theater of Chicago is a specialist on "lemon" houses. He took the above citrus fruit, dressed it up with flowers and lo, abundant revenue issued forth. Anyone married to a lemon better see Emil.

GRACIOUS!

Grace Darmond, pulchritudinous Pathe star, had to come all the way from New York to Mr. Bunn's Chicago projecting room to see herself in "The Shielding Shadow." And still there are some who claim that the Zephyrous Village is not the logical center of the industry.

"What the Picture Did for Me"

ACTUAL CRITICISM OF FILMS BY EXHIBITORS, FROM A BUSINESS STANDPOINT

(Editorial Note:—"The trade paper that can give the most accurate information about current features is the paper every exhibitor wants," said a prominent manager recently. In addition to its regular reviews, Motography will each week hereafter print the actual unvarnished opinions of exhibitors on films they have run in their houses, with the idea of aiding other exhibitors in making up their programs. Managers and bookers like to get various opinions concerning a feature before they run it. Upon request Motography will gladly furnish the opinion of men who have run the feature in question. Simply address, Motography, Chicago.)

"In The Shine Girl, with Gladys Hulette (Pathe), the star portrays her part mighty well, and as a whole it was one of the most pleasing pictures I have ever had in my house."—Harry Gramp, Orpheum Theater, Rockford, Ill.

"Wanted—A Home, with Mary McLaren, is a very good picture."—Manager, Strand Theater.

"Douglas Fairbanks, in Manhattan Madness (Triangle). A knockout."—Jack Haag, Bandbox Theater.

"Papa, by Proxy, with Max Figman (Metro Comedy). Far from good."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

"My patrons commented favorably on The War Bride's Secret (Fox)."—S. Trinz, Covent Garden Theater, Chicago.

"J. Warren Kerrigan, in The Social Buccaneers—first-rate Bluebird production. Photography and scenery beautiful."—Ed. Levin, Langley Theater.

"The Big Sister (Paramount), featuring May Murray, is a very good picture and was well received at my theater."—Manager, Strand Theater.

"The Chaplin Revue (Essanay), made up of the 'Tramp,' 'His New Job,' and 'A Night Out,' is very cleverly put together."—George Moore, Orpheum Theater.

"Florence La Badie in The Fear of Poverty (Pathe) is a great attraction and drawing card. Personally, I liked it immensely."—Ed. Levin, Langley Theater.

"The War Bride's Secret (Fox), featuring Virginia Pearson. As a picture, good. The star good. Went over big with the public."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

"Sporting Blood (Fox), featuring Dorothy Bernard. My patrons said it was the best picture that has ever been shown in Rockford."—Harry Gramp, Orpheum, Rockford, Ill.

"The Straight Way (Fox), with Valeska Suratt, is an excellent box office attraction. The star, however, is not convincing. The picture as a whole is only good."—Jack Haag, Bandbox Theater, Chicago.

"Her Husband's Wife, with Mignon Anderson and Sallie Crute (Ivan), proved to be a mighty good friend to the box office."—Sigmund Faller, Bijou Dream Theater.

"Marvelous Maciste (E. L. K.). We lost money on this picture because we had to return over $20.00 to patrons who did not wish to wait in line."—Carl Lagerquist, Palm Theater.

"I saw Metro's Romeo and Juliet, featuring Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, and think it an artistic production, which is well put together."—George Moore, Orpheum theater.

"The Iron Woman, featuring Nance O'Neill (Metro). The star good. The story very mediocre. Photography just good. Business big."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

Jones, Linick & Schaefer anticipate playing a Christmas matinee with Where Are My Children? which is starting on its twelfth big week at their La Salle Theater, in the loop, Chicago.

"The Ku Klux Klan scenes in the Flower of Faith, Golden Eagle feature, with Jane Gray, gives this picture an appeal that compares favorably with that of The Birth of a Nation."—Manager, Strand Theater.

"While The Little Girl Next Door does not keep one spell-bound in one's seat, it manages to put over its idea in a sensible way. It is the best of its kind I have seen in a long time."—Manager, Strand Theater.

"The Ragged Princess, featuring June Caprice (Fox). The star has no drawing power. The picture is a comedy drama and a sure-fire knock-out. Box office receipts big."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

"We are charging twenty cents admission to see Clara Kimball Young in Selznick's The Common Law, and are playing to capacity houses. It surely is a wonderful production."—Sigmund Faller, Bijou Dream Theater.

"The Parson of Panamint (Paramount), featuring Dustin Farnum, is a really excellent production in every respect. Pictures of this kind are bound to bring a finer element to your theater."—Manager, Strand Theater.

"The 1916 World's Series Baseball Games (Selig), showing the entire five games recently played by the Boston and Brooklyn teams, went over with a bang at all of our houses."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

"The Revolt, with Francis Nelson and Arthur Ashley (World). The story, which is somewhat suggestive, is a cinema reproduction of Helen Ware's great stage success. As a money getter, great."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

"We played a repeat on Her Double Life (Fox), featuring Theda Bara, and in spite of the fact that it rained the entire day on which we showed it, we did a bigger business than on the first engagement."—George Moore, Orpheum theater.

"I have shown six episodes of The Crimson Stain Mystery (Consolidated), featuring Maurice Costello and Ethel Grandin. All have been good and the serial is holding up well. The acting of the principals is very clever."—Manager Barrett, Pastime Theater.

"Philip Holden—Waster (Mutual), with Richard Bennett, is one of those pictures which, unfortunately, are handicapped with a poor title. As a whole, the picture can be classed as a comedy drama of a highly pleasing type."—George Moore, Orpheum Theater.

"The Social Buccaneer (Bluebird), with J. Warren Kerrigan, established a Saturday record for this house. The story is of the Oriental type, with very little appeal. The star, however, puts this picture over with a bang."—Jack Haag, Bandbox Theater, Chicago.

"The Bird in a Gilded Cage (World) is a costume play containing a great deal of impossible stuff. The details are well executed and the fact that Alice Brady is featured is what makes this picture a good box office attraction."—George Moore, Orpheum Theater.

"William S. Hart in The Return of Draw Egan (Triangle) compares favorably with the star's earlier production, Hell's Hinges. At any rate, I did a bigger business with this picture than with any feature in which Hart was featured."—George Moore, Orpheum Theater.

"The Return of Draw Egan, with W. S. Hart (Triangle), kept me so busy taking in the money that I did not get a chance to see the picture. We made more money on this feature than we have ever before made on any of Hart's vehicles."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

"Love Never Dies (Bluebird), is Ruth Stonehouse's first release under the "U" banner. There are a number of pretty ballet scenes in which the star is given an opportunity to demonstrate her ability as an artistic dancer. The story of the picture is laid in France; all in all a very good production."—George Moore, Orpheum Theater.

"We played a repeat on The Little School Ma'am (Triangle), featuring Dorothy Gish and the Twenty Triangle Kids. This picture gave us the biggest Sunday we have ever had. As a picture, clever comedy, the star mediocre; the Twenty Triangle Kids, great. An unusual box office attraction."—Carl Lagerquist, Palm Theater, Chicago.

"I have been connected with pictures in some one way or another for the past sixteen years, and I must admit that Forbidden Fruit, with Paula Shay (General Feature Film Company), is one of the best pictures I have seen. Its story is of the modern type, containing all the elements of truth, combined with a powerful moral. The receipts at my house on the day I showed this picture were exceptionally good."—Manager, Strand Theater.

"Old Folks at Home, with Sir Herbert Tree (Triangle), was well carried out by the character principals. There is, however, one objectionable feature about the picture—that of an unjustified murder and a jury verdict of not guilty influenced wholly by a mother's tears. This in spite of the undeniably incriminating evidence presented. But it is a good box office attraction and we did very well with it."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater, Chicago.

Artcraft Exchanges Expanding

Hoyt G. Morrow, formerly representative of the General Film Company in New Orleans, has been appointed manager of the Dallas exchange of the Artcraft Pictures Corporation distributing Mary Pickford productions. Mr. Morrow succeeds John J. Rotchford, who has resigned.

The New York exchange has already outgrown the original quarters assigned to Manager Arthur G. Whyte, and Charles S. Goetz, his assistant, and they are now installed in spacious new offices in the Godfrey building.

Al. Lichtman, general manager for Artcraft, spent several days last week in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh in consultation with B. C. Cunningham and Samuel Plane, the respective exchange managers. Mr. Litchman is very much gratified with the bookings reported for these territories.

Vitagraph Comedies on General

Edward J. Montague is the author of "Trouble for Four," one of the funniest comedies Vitagraph has ever released through the General film exchanges. The plot of this rollicksome comedy, deals with circumstantial evidence tending to show that the bridegroom has dined with the other woman. The other woman, however, has never seen him, and when his pal keeps the appointment, she immediately rushes to the honeymoon cottage to tell the foolish little wife that hubby has been untrue. This is the release of Monday, October 23.

On Friday, October 27, the General film exchanges will release "Betty's Affair," a comedy ripe with the dash of clean humor, and nice situations, well set off by a delightful screen actress.

Paramount Exchange Grows

The Famous Players exchange, distributing Paramount Pictures in eastern Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, District of Columbia and Virginia, with its main office at 1321 Vine street, Philadelphia, Pa., will, about December 1, 1916, move into larger quarters at 1219 Vine street, in the very heart of the film district. The exchange will occupy the entire ground floor of this new building, and it will be one of the most pretentious film exchange offices in the East. William E. Smith is president of the exchange.

Second Unity Release

The Unity Sales Corporation are releasing this week the second Tweedledum comedy, under the title of "A Scrambled Honeymoon," featuring the eccentric acrobatic comedian, Perez.

Four Spokane Theaters Combine

A CONSOLIDATION of four picture theaters of Spokane, Washington—the Casino, the Class A, the Rex and the Unique—has been completed and hereafter these houses will be operated by a corporation. C. E. Stilwell, proprietor of the Casino, the Class A and the Unique, will be general manager, and B. W. Copeland, proprietor of the Rex, will be assistant manager and publicity representative.

The new corporation will be capitalized at $50,000, and will assume the active management of the theaters as soon as the legal formalities can be complied with. The articles of incorporation have been arranged for at the state capital.

The amalgamation is the result of negotiations that have been pending for about a year. They started when Mr. Stilwell purchased the Class A Theater from Lee Forbes nearly a year ago. Another step was taken recently when he purchased the Casino Theater from the Clemmer estate. The Class A, as the Clem, and the Casino, were established by the late John Clemmer, a pioneer in the film business in the northwest.

By the purchase of the Rex Mr. Stilwell secured the last link in his chain of picture houses. Seven years ago he took over the Unique, then a nickleodeon of a primitive sort, and has made it a money-maker. The same is true of the experience of the Rex, under the direction of Mr. Copeland. He purchased the interest of C. D. Robinson some months ago, and has been full owner since that time.

Mr. Stilwell announces that the Casino and the Class A will show "first-run" pictures only, while the "second-runs" will be shifted to the Rex and the Unique when they are of a character that appeals to the clientele of that theater. The bulk of the offerings will be selected from the releases of the Metro, Fox, World and Mutual studios, Mr. Stilwell states. He is also negotiating for the new Clara Kimball Young and Mary Pickford productions.

The Casino has seating capacity of about 600; the Class A 400; the Rex 460, and the Unique 325. On averages of the last few years the four theaters play to approximately 1,925,000 people annually.

The combined house staffs, which will be retained throughout with the exception of the managers, number 31 people, divided as follows: Casino 10, Class A 9, Rex 6, and Unique 6.

"Consolidation is the order of the day in the film business as in other lines," said Mr. Stilwell. "We are incorporating for the primary purpose of cutting down the overhead cost of operation without minimizing the quality of entertainment. We have already worked out a combined saving on the four theaters of $1,500 a month by lopping off duplicated positions.

"It is our intention to put this entire saving into improved film service. There will be no cutting in that regard. We will present the best pictures available. We will limit stock to residents of Spokane. We limit individual stock subscriptions to $100."

Mr. Stilwell will make extensive improvements on all the theater properties.

Brand New Montana House

Butte's newest picture theater, the Liberty, was thrown open to the public some time ago.

The Liberty is operated by the Liberty Amusement Company, of which M. A. Berger is manager.

The Liberty of Butte, Montana, managed by M. A. Berger.

It confines itself to a straight picture policy and admission prices are 5 and 10 cents for afternoon shows and 10 and 15 cents for evening. The personnel of the house staff includes John Curran, formerly of the Empress, doorman; S. Cummings, operator, and Miss Nellie Pierce, cashier.

Chester Gillette, leader of the Symphony orchestra, directs the Liberty's four-piece orchestra. A Steinway baby grand piano is used.

The Liberty is one of the prettiest little theaters in the state. It will seat 450 people and is of Spanish Colonial style of architecture. The front is of glazed terra cotta, trimmed in Tuxekan marble, the latter from Alaskan quarries which are just now closed down. The interior decorations are most tasteful and the comfort of the patrons has been one of the foremost considerations in the plan. The picture projection booth is of concrete and absolutely fireproof.

New Detroit House Nearing Completion

At the offices of John H. Kunsky, head of the John H. Kunsky Enterprises, Inc., of Detroit, artists, designers and salesmen come and go all day long, bringing their samples and their suggestions for beautifying the new Madison theater which is being built for Mr. Kunsky at Grand Circus Park and Broadway.

The lobby of the new theater will be an innovation. Instead of the cold, uninviting, cheerless atmosphere that usually pervades a theater entrance, the Madison lobby will partake of the interior decorative effect. As soon as you step in at the entrance, which will face the park, you will feel that you are in the theater.

The decorative color scheme of the new Madison will be white, green, gold and ivory, with rich draperies and carpets to harmonize. Designs for the lighting fixtures are now being submitted, and the electrical equipment is going to admit of all manner of beautiful effects. If the subject on the screen is cold and blue or warm with sunlight, the lights in all parts of the theater will be the same.

The Madison theater will surpass anything that has ever been built in Michigan for public entertainment, and will rival the big theaters of the east. It will be one of the beauty spots of Detroit.

New Manager for New York's Big Strand

One of America's youngest theatrical managers is Harold Edel, who is the new managing director of the Strand Theater, New York.

Mr. Edel is only 27 years of age, but he has proved himself an unusual executive, which accounts for his rise in the theatrical profession. He was born in Greenville, South Carolina, and is a graduate of the Georgia University. His entry into the field of amusement was rather a humble one and occurred in 1904, when he took charge of a Penny Arcade located on East Fourteenth street, New York, owned by Mitchell H. Mark, now president of the Mark Strand Theater Company, owners and operators of the Strand Theater.

Harold Edel, the new 27-year-old manager of New York's splendid Strand.

Mr. Mark soon transferred Mr. Edel to Lawrence, Massachusetts to take charge of a small picture theater seating 125 persons. Mr. Edel proved himself capable of affairs bigger than the Lawrence theater and after managing this institution for six months he was transferred to Cleveland, Ohio, and given charge of the Coliseum and Globe theaters, both of which institutions he managed successfully for two years. At that time the new Alhambra Theater, located in Cleveland's exclusive section, was opened and Mr. Edel was appointed its managing director. The Alhambra was one of America's most luxurious picture theaters and one of the first which had a pipe organ installed.

Later Mr. Edel accepted the position of general manager for the Kinemacolor Company of Canada, in which capacity he presented the famous Durbar pictures in every theater of consequence from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coasts in Canada. Later he was made general manager for the Mark-Brock Theatrical Enterprises in Buffalo and served with this firm until the new Strand Theater in Buffalo, in which he had purchased an interest, was built, when he took charge of that institution as managing director.

Mr. Edel's experience has given him a keen insight into the motion picture field, and he has the happy faculty of studying his audiences and making up programs to their liking.

Another Successful Fashion Show

Among the progressive exhibitors who have staged fashion shows at their houses this summer is R. T. Hurtt, of the Hurtt Theater, Caldwell, Idaho. As have been all the style shows we have heard about, Manager Hurtt's specialty was a booming success and all his women patrons look upon it as a real service. We let Mr. Hurtt speak for himself:

"I took the idea of the fashion show which was pulled off at the Paramount-Empress Theater in Salt Lake City and of which I read in Real Reels.

"I wish emphatically to recommend this to all exhibitors who have not tried it, as it is positively the best stunt I have had anything to do with. It is the best tonic a showman ever took, both from a money-getter and an advertising standpoint.

"No town is too small to put it over. All you need is to mention it to one or two of the leading dry goods stores and they will sure fall for it.

"The crowds simply swamped me the first night and completely filled my house the second night, and the best part of it is that it costs practically nothing to stage it; in fact, the dry goods stores paid half of my extra music, while I raked in all of the receipts. They are already planning on it for next year and all of the gents' furnishing stores have asked to get in. It is surely a winner."

The Boise Daily Statesman told the story of the Huree Theater fashion show in detail. It mentioned how the theater building was too small to hold the crowds, what a hit the augmented orchestra was and how lovely the living models were. It gave their names, too, and told how the local caterers and cafe people served refreshments free.

New Wage Scale in Butte

As a result of the new wage scale adopted a short time ago in Butte, Montana, which has been followed by every amusement house in that city, the theatrical employes are receiving the best pay for their work. The new scale provides for $42 per seven day week for motion picture machine operators; $35 for stage managers; $27.50 for grips; $31.50 for props. $45 to $52.50 for orchestra leaders and 40 for musicians.

The results obtained prove the theory that the better paid men are the more efficient and economical. The service given by the motion picture theaters of Butte is the best that can be found anywhere and all but two smaller houses have orchestras made up of real artists and the musical accompaniment to the pictures is an attraction in itself.

Lloyd D. Willis, assistant general manager of the Fox Film Corporation, passed through Chicago October 12, on his way to Australia in the interest of his firm. He took "A Daughter of the Gods," and "The Honor System," new Fox features, the latter dealing with prison reform. There are at present six Fox exchanges in Australia.

Dorothy Barrett has been added to the staff of Eugene B. Lewis, scenario editor at Universal City, as a reader of scripts.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

THE picture house at Hegins, Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, has been turned into a hospital to handle the sixty cases of typhoid fever found in that locality.

Carl F. Starbeck, manager and proprietor of the Star theater at Montevideo, Minnesota, died last week from blood poisoning caused by appendicitis.

Manager Jennings' Hartford Theater at Hartford Connecticut, has just finished a week's run of Ince's "Civilization" to good business.

Thirty exhibitors joined the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the Northwest at a meeting held at the Bijou Theater, Minneapolis, a short time ago. President James Gilosky presided at the session.

Max Weissfeldt, formerly manager of the Mutual Exchange at Omaha, Nebraska, has been appointed special assistant to Benny Judell, district manager of the Mutual Film Corporation with offices at Chicago.

Harry Rathner and M. H. Conhaim of Minneapolis have organized the Unity Feature Corporation of Minneapolis for the releasing of a feature program and comedies in that territory with one high-class release every two weeks.

At the Liberty Theater in New York D. W. Griffith's big play "Intolerance" has entered its second month of big business. The Griffith play will open in Chicago following the run of "The Birth of a Nation," which is at present holding the screen at the Colonial.

A new film corporation has been started at Sioux City, Iowa, called the Globe Film Corporation. It is under the management of J. P. Duncan. The new company contemplates entering the feature business and for a time will release one to four large features each month.

Jones, Linick and Schaefer, one of the largest exhibiting firms in Chicago, has arranged for the exhibition of pre-releases of "War Brides" featuring Mme. Nazimova and also the new Mary Pickford productions. These will be shown soon in one of the large Chicago houses.

"Only Ladies Admitted." The big sign carrying those words across the front of the Band Box Theater on Madison street, Chicago, magnetized large crowds of women and fills the loop house to the brim every day. "The Unborn" is the ultra-modern feature shown. It was produced by the Kulee company.

It is a little bit late right now to put the stunt into practice, excepting in the Southern states, but it is interesting to know that Manager Cronk of the Allen Theater in Calgary, Alberta, drew great flocks of kiddies to his house last summer by giving an ice cream cone to every child attending his Saturday matinee.

Exhibitors of the Central Western territory are to have an opportunity soon to learn something about the film concerning which many theater men have inquired, entitled "The Unborn." H. L. Wallick is now making a flying trip from New York to the coast placing the rights for the film in the various territories.

One of the most prominent exhibitors of the East last week held in Chicago an important conference with some of the most extensive exhibitors of the West. Marcus Loew of New York held a consultation with Jones, Linick and Schaefer concerning the showing of a number of large special feature films in the near future.

Bills at the downtown picture houses in Chicago for the week of October 15 included the twelfth week of "Where Are My Children?" at the La Salle; "The Unborn" at the Bandbox; E. H. Sothern in "The Chattel" at the Ziegfeld; Marie Doro in "The Lash" at the Castle; "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea" at the Studebaker; and "The Birth of a Nation" at the Colonial.

The city council of Dallas, Oregon, has raised the yearly picture house license from $40 yearly to $100, payable in advance. Manager O. C. Smith has closed his Orpheum on account of the increase, which comes in addition to the federal tax of $75, increasing his expenses by $15 a month. F. R. Noyes of the Lyric, Cornell, Wisconsin, reports a similar prohibitive $100 tax in his town.

Banners on automobiles is the particular advertising favored by William Roper, manager of the Roper Theater, Council Bluffs Iowa. At the beginning of each performance he takes out his machine, dresses it up with banners with big flaring letters and parades the streets. Mr. Roper reports that business is very satisfactory indeed.

The New Madison Theater on Grand Circus Park in Detroit will open in a few weeks. Among the features in this splendid new house will be rest rooms, reading rooms, smoking rooms and a beautiful balcony encircling the main auditorium, where, amid luxurious surroundings, patrons can wait for their friends or pass the time listening to the organ music.

J. S. Walker and H. E. Hendrickson of the Walker Transfer Company, Minneapolis, are evolving a plan of gathering and distributing films for the Twin City theater managers. This plan is guaranteed to insure rapid service, accuracy, and save time and expense for the exhibitor. The Walker Transfer Company has three fast motor trucks in commission, is a union concern, and maintains depot connections.

The motion picture exhibitors of Philadelphia have been warned that they must be more honest in their advertising as they are hurting the business of the legitimate houses. The exhibitors have been announcing that different stars would appear in their houses and have not been careful to state that they would appear on the screen and not in person, and this has hurt the two dollar legitimate houses in which those actors are appearing.

An enterprising manager of a Western Theater recently issued a special invitation to all of the police courts of his town to attend a special performance which included a "safety first" film. The coppers were highly enthusiastic and the manager now has a number of splendid friends among the defenders of the law. These may come in handy some time.

The Rialto Theater of New York is offering, on its program for the week of October 15, some special war pictures taken by the official photographer to the French Government. In addition, this Metropolitan house is showing Triangle's "Fifty-Fifty," along with a Keystone comedy and the regular educational and scenic pictures, the news weekly.

The Civic League of Salt Lake City, an organization of prominent women, has requested the management of the Paramount-Empress Theater to run special Saturday productions for children. The first matinee in response to this request was given on October 14 with Mary Pickford in "Cinderella," some Paramount-Bray cartoons and Burton Holmes travel pictures. Here is a good example of co-operation on the part of a house with the civic authorities.

One doesn't usually conceive of the Y. M. C. A. as being in the motion picture business. However, this national organization has a very complete film department and continually gives performances at a number of its larger branches. During the encampment of the National Guard on the Mexican border this summer the Y. M. C. A. gave a number of outdoor performances for the benefit of the soldiers. Thousands of rookies would sit on the ground for hours watching the films, many of which were industrial subjects.

Did you ever use a two page spread in your local newspaper? Manager J. E. Hoehler of the Orpheum Theater, Sheridan, Wyoming, has just finished monopolizing that much space in the Sheridan Daily Enterprise. The reason for this large display is "find the missing word and name the star" contest. The entire two pages were taken up with eight advertisements, embracing those of the theater in the center surrounded by announcements by leading merchants of the city.

"Every redheaded boy in this city can join the Clemmer Redhead Club and come to the Clemmer Theater free of charge." This announcement was recently made by Manager Howard S. Clemmer of the Clemmer Theater at Spokane, Washington, and it brought out 187 redheads. Those who were under six years or over twelve were not admitted into the club. Each member of the brick top organization is given free admission to the theater each week. Manager Clemmer states that these carrot tops are the snappiest boosters his theater ever had.

A. H. Hilton of Lewiston, Iowa, has started something new—a midnight matinee. "If exhibitors haven't tried the midnight matinee stunt already," says Mr. Hilton, "they surely should get busy for it is a winner. I open the show at midnight sharp, dress the ushers in pajamas, the orchestra burlesques the music and we give everybody a rattle to keep time with. Several times the police have been called out to handle my crowds. We turned away three times as many as we played to and they were all willing to pay twenty-five cents to see the show."

The Lehigh Orpheum Theater of South Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, printed the following in its program to catch the local interest:

"It may be of interest to football fans to know that we will install a direct wire in the theater for the Lehigh-Yale foot ball game, which will be played at New Haven, Conn., October 14.

"If you have the price go with the team to New Haven and root for them, but if funds are low we will furnish you with the inside dope on the game just as it is played at a small price of admission."

George E. Carpenter, manager of the Paramount-Empress Theater of Salt Lake City, claims that he is seriously considering the proposition of holding an auction sale of unclaimed articles left in his house by patrons. Mr. Carpenter has advertised a number of forgotten articles for some time, but no owners appear. He states that among other things now in his miscellaneous lost collection are a dozen or more hand bags, a couple of vanity cases, a bale of handkerchiefs, a number of pairs of gloves and rubbers and a plate of false teeth. He even declares that this summer a woman left her baby in the nursery of the theater and went home without it.

Manager Ned Holmes of the Studebaker Theater, Chicago, has a soft heart. When a row of kids were standing in the rain vainly attempting to get seats for "Twenty-Thousand Leagues Under the Sea" last week, he went out to them and made the announcement that he would run a special Saturday morning matinee for their benefit. The first morning matinee of this kind was held last Saturday at 10 o'clock. The prices charged were twenty-five and fifty cents. The Studebaker seats 1,400 and every seat was sold out for every performance during the first week.

Several hundred dollars went up in printer's ink one morning last week when Ascher Brother of Chicago, who own a chain of eight first class houses in the city, took in co-operation with the various Chicago exchanges, a page advertisement in the Chicago Tribune. The display consisted of a zinc cut covering the entire page and containing halftones and descriptions of the eight Ascher houses. Space was also given to Metro, Mutual, Universal, Paramount, Selznick and Bluebird ads with their trademarks. "Ascher's Theaters present the utmost in photoplays," was the big hand lettered head across the top of the page.

The Strand Theater of Evansville, Indiana, is one of the latest houses to conduct a successful style show. The management of the house secured the co-operation of the leading merchants of the city and the latter provided the theater with young girls to act as models. One hundred and forty-two young women anticipated in the event. At each performance from ten to forty walked before the footlights in the latest fashions of all sorts of apparel during the five days which the style show ran at the Strand. There were something over 17,000 admissions to the house; breaking all records. The newspapers of Evansville were interested in the show and gave the matter a generous amount of space.

The Hand That Turns the Sprocket

IT will be realized at once that we used the word "sprocket" in the title for the sake of euphony. We should have said "crank," regardless of whether we were talking about a camera or a projector. The "Independent," in a recent issue, gives it still differently: "The hand that turns the cinema rules the world." Which, disregarding our dislike for the term cinema, is a pretty wise statement.

Of course there are a lot of things that have claimed rulership of the world, from the hand that rocks the cradle to the foot that treadles the press in the country print shop. But the reference to the cradle-rocker was always metaphorical, of course; and we are beginning to have some doubts about the press, having been associated with one long enough to realize its limitations. The power of the press is really an ingenious paradox. An editorial, for example—the only part of the press that tries to rule anything—is useless unless it is logical; yet the more logic it contains, the less impression it makes on the gentle reader. The human being is a thinking animal, to be sure; but it dreads the process, and avoids it wherever possible.

The press is an incentive to thought; and the more it insists on thought, the less it is read. The motion picture, on the contrary, is a substitute for thought. Its message is predigested, and passes through the alimentary canals of the human mind without demanding any perceptible flow of the gastro-mental juices that the average person so hates to give up.

Therefore, we indorse, and reiterate, and assert positively what the "Independent" advanced tentatively—that the hand that turns the cinema, or the sprocket, or the crank, rules the world. And for the purposes of the newly established proverb, it really does not matter whether the crank is on a camera or a projecting machine. "Shoot-the-Piece Victor" and "Oswald the Operator" are joint rulers in their own right.

The press of this country in its varied form has circulated through the length and breadth of seven continents for lo, these many years with never a protest from the powers of other countries with presses of their own. Our editorials have proclaimed the superiority of all things American world without end, and the net result has overwhelmed nobody. Yet now Great Britain, mistress of the seas and considerable land, takes alarm at the inoculation of the Orient with the germs of Americanitis via that greatest of intellectual germ-carriers, the humble film.

Verily the motion picture is the universal language, and greater than all languages; for the eye is greater than the ear. All the language in the world will not establish a definite picture in the mind so permanently as a hundred feet of film—the only guaranteed short cut to the human memory cells.

Isn't it a curious anomaly that the thinking press of today has a clearer perception of the titanic, awe-inspiring, world-swaying possibilities of the motion picture than most film men themselves have?

Exports After the War

WE believe that when a war is over, it should be ended—even so big a war as the one that is now in progress. The Allies do not think so, for they are making all sorts of preparations to embarrass the Central Powers commercially after the military operations have ceased. Bearing on this subject is an editorial in the English "Bioscope" entitled "Enemy Films After the War." A resolution has already been approved by a conference of English exhibitors that "enemy films" should not be admitted for five years after the war is over. And there is this recommendation, also: That with all films from neutral countries there should be a guarantee, if possible, that "enemy" producers and "enemy" financiers are not concerned in their origin.

This country is not the enemy of any one, and would certainly resent the classification of any of its citizens as such. Nevertheless, all who read the daily papers are familiar with the British blacklist edict, and its reflection upon American manufacturers. International boycotts are far more difficult to adjust than the domestic variety, and strict justice does not often enter into the question.

The situation, therefore, will bear watching by those film manufacturers who export to countries now fighting under the banner of the Allies.

The Censorship Views of Political Candidates

IN another part of this issue we are reproducing a number of letters received within the last few days from candidates for state and national offices, expressing their convictions on the subject of film censorship. As we have printed a line of identification with each letter, it is unnecessary to classify the communicants here. We will merely call attention to the significant fact that out of this week's budget of ten letters, eight are distinctly unfavorable to censorship in any form.

If the numerical proportion would hold good all the way, the danger of censorship would be over. We hope further communications will maintain the plurality. But the test, interesting as it undoubtedly is, and significant as it may be of legislative attitude, is yet too small to afford security. We should have the assurances of a majority of all the candidates that censorship in any guise will draw their negative vote. The National Association of the Motion Picture Industry has already accomplished much in that direction, as is well known; the next President of the United States, whoever he may be, has been reported and various smaller celebrities have been put on record. And the most surprising thing about all this questioning of political aspirants is the extremely large percentage of anti-censorship sentiment the answers appear to reveal.

The amount of actual censorship now in effect in the United States is really very small; but it makes a great deal of noise. It creates so much disturbance, indeed, that we are appalled when we contemplate what might be wrought by any addition to the present number of official censor boards. Only a few states, and proportionately few cities, have censors, and the nation itself has none. Yet, if the reformers were left to hatch their schemes without hindrance, within two years the federal government, every state, and a hundred towns and cities would be taking their toll out of the mutilated, emasculated and unrecognizable remains of the motion picture art.

Keen and experienced men will need no reminder of the fact that the most effective time to stop objectionable legislation is before it stars. To effect the repeal of a law that has passed, to abolish an institution that is established, is almost impossible. To prevent the passage of bills that have been introduced is always possible, but usually difficult and expensive. By making sure that a majority of the law-makers who are elected are opposed to censorship, the introduction of censorship bills is prevented at the source.

Therefore, by all means, keep after the candidates until they know our attitude and the importance of the subject, even if they decline to commit themselves upon it. Don't let the proposition come to them for the first time, after they have been elected, in the form of a request for their vote on some harmless looking bill that will set the picture industry back ten years.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

So many letters have been received from different exhibitors who have asked me to give a little sketch of my ideals in connection with my own theater and some of the ways in which I systematize the running of the Rialto that I am forced to answer them all at one fell swoop and reveal some of my cherished ambitions, and my methods of developing them, in the hopes that these may be of help to some brother manager.

Methods Pronounced Unbusinesslike

I am often accused of being extravagant and too idealistic. My methods have been pronounced unbusinesslike, but I believe that the results tell and they most certainly have proved otherwise, and shown that my so-called extravagance was really an investment which paid large dividends in the end.

One reason that many so-called business men fail is because they believe that ideals have no place in business. That is far from the truth. Base an enterprise upon a high ideal and success is sure to follow. If more business men were idealists more of them would be successful. The extravagance with which I have been charged has been based upon an ideal that the great mass of American people want entertainment of the highest class amid surroundings in which they are carefree and comfortable and made to feel that they are in a house of rest and refreshment. Results at the Rialto have proved that that ideal has been a great business asset and not a liability.

One decided proof of all this is that the cheap, the tawdry, the sensational and the slimy has already begun to pass out of the motion picture. Only those producers who are giving the best in pictures are surviving. The public objects to the salacious and poorer class of pictures and shows it by withholding its patronage. The people are perfectly capable of being their own censors and are in every respect—there is no need for official censorship.

Psychology of Entertainment

Most people's idea of the equipment of a motion picture theater is a screen, a projection machine and a few films which are ground out half a dozen times a day—and in too many instances this is all that many houses do offer. But such shows do not scratch the possibilities of motion picture entertainment. What I am doing at the Rialto Theater is merely the development of an idea which I call the "psychology of entertainment." I strive from the moment the patron buys a ticket to place him in an atmosphere of harmony and pleasurable emotion. Every employe of the house is a part of this entertainment—the ticket seller, ticket taker, the ushers, the maids in the retiring rooms, as well as the orchestra, the singers and the operators. And each of these employes is instructed to contribute his part toward the comfort and pleasure of every patron.

Accessories as Important as Pictures

As to the show itself, I have paid as much attention to the accessories as to the pictures because I believe they are just as important. The music and lighting are particularly important and may greatly enhance the mood of the picture being shown and help impress upon the minds of the spectators the spirit and the thought which it is desired they should receive from the dramatic or comic situations shown on the screen.

The lighting effects at the Rialto have created a great deal of attention and have played a large part in this "psychology of entertainment." Lights may be played just as musical instruments. There can be a virtuoso of the switchboard just as well as a virtuoso of the keyboard, and I believe I have one here at the Rialto, but we have only made a beginning in the development of this lighting idea and I expect during the coming winter to develop some really astonishing effects in this department. What little we have done in this line shows the close affinity of light and sound and the crescendos and diminuendos and the changing colors of light used with the musical numbers has been very effective.

The musical features are my particular hobby. I love to direct the orchestra myself and do occasionally. I am very proud of my orchestra and the leader, Hugo Reisenfeld, and believe I speak correctly when I claim that there are only two better orchestras in the whole United States, the Boston Symphony and that of the Metropolitan Opera House. But even so I am not yet fully satisfied and am working all the time to bring it to the highest point of perfection.

Work Is Institutional

My work in the Rialto is what I call "institutional"—that is, I am endeavoring to make such a perfect institution of the theater that people will not stop to ask what picture is being shown but will come to the Rialto as a matter of course, being sure that there they will find the highest class of entertainment of its kind.

Recently I have added dancers as a part of my regular program and many people have questioned my judgment in this respect. I feel, however, that dances such as are being given in this theater are merely another form of pictures. I am planning more of these for the winter and will show a series of interpretative dances different from anything heretofore attempted, but which I am sure will prove most popular.

Preparing the Program

So much for my ideals. As to the actual running system of my theater I select all the material and develop and rehearse it myself—this is much too important to be left to any assistants no matter how competent they may be. The bill at the Rialto is changed once a week. Thursday night after the last show is ended I begin preparing for the next week. At that time I look over the feature film selected for the next week and edit it. If there are any objectionable scenes I eliminate them and with all due respect to the directors, I find in many instances the play can be made more dramatic by a little judicious cutting and piecing.

After the film has been pruned to my satisfaction I call together the musical director and his staff and skeletonize the music to be used with the picture. This is no small task and we often work steadily at it until four or five o'clock in the morning.

On Friday night, after midnight, the picture is run again with the music as selected. If any of the music is then found to be inappropriate it is rejected and more suitable substituted.

All during the week I have been gathering units for my Rialto Topical Digest and on Saturday night I select the final features of the weekly, and after Saturday night's performance assemble the Topical and select the music for it.

At 9:30 Sunday morning I have a rehearsal in full of the entire performance—the soloists, dancers and all. All preliminary arrangements have been made so carefully that this rehearsal runs almost like a first performance and seldom requires more than a half hour longer than the public presentation. Everything is in such shape by this time that when the regular entertainment starts at one o'clock the first performance runs just as smoothly as does the last one given in the week.

The Future of Motion Pictures

Speaking of the motion pictures in general, I believe they are yet in their infancy and there is a wonderful future before them not only as a form of public entertainmnet but also as a power in commercial and educational fields. I believe that motion pictures are destined to play an enormous part in the development of many businesses and will become a greater educational and religious influence than any other one factor since the perfection of the art of printing.

The time is coming—and it is not far distant—when every nation and every city will have libraries of films just as they have libraries of books and manuscripts. And the time is also coming when every home and every apartment will be equipped with a screen and projection machine just as every one is now supplied with a piano and victrola.

NEW ADVERTISING IDEA

Triangle Film Corporation Puts Out With Each Feature a Trailer Showing the "High Spots" of Next Release

The Triangle Film Corporation has inaugurated a novelty that is generating large quantities of satisfaction in the breasts of the exhibitors throughout the country. With each release now sent forth by Triangle goes from 75 to 100 feet of pictorial trailer calling attention to the high spots and features in the succeeding release.

The new trailer is artistically designed and represents considerable care of selection on the part of the studios, being made up of from two to three different scenes from the coming play, and some specially prepared sub-titles indicating the character of the play, together with the star appearing therein, and also the features of the drama. In commenting upon the new trailers Mr. H. E. Aitken, president of the Triangle Film Corporation, said:

"We have been led to this step by the sheer logic of the situation. We realized that the screen itself is a most powerful advertising medium, and one that was not being taken full advantage of. Millions of people 'read the screen' each day, and we felt that we had this circulation to draw upon, and at a peculiarly psychological moment, too, for the people were interested in motion pictures, obviously, while they were facing the screen, and it seemed to us that this was the time to call their attention to something that would occur next week.

"Exhibitors have written us enthusiastically about the new trailers, and we are more than pleased with the result. One man writes us: 'In my opinion this trailer is one of the best advertisements you could give the coming attractions. Each trailer is different and immediately attracts attention.' Another exhibitor says: 'We feel you have made a long step in advance in giving us these splendid trailers. Triangle is to be congratulated on the enterprise displayed. We feel they are most valuable and are sure to increase our business.'

"Letters are constantly arriving and we feel, with all becoming modesty, that we have struck a novelty that is of real, constructive service to the exhibitor."

Editor Lauds Grace Darmond

A splendid tribute is paid to Miss Grace Darmond and "The Shielding Shadow," Pathe's Wonder-Serial in which she appears, by one of the daily newspapers in Columbus.

The following paragraphs are extracts from an article which appeared under a large type headline, and according to the Pathe Company they are typical of what newspaper reviewers and those of the public who have seen private showings of "The Shielding Shadow" think of it:

The most beautiful thing that the editor of this paper has ever seen flashed upon the screen is Miss Grace Darmond in the wonderful new Pathe serial, "The Shielding Shadow." Miss Darmond may have peers in acting, although she does splendid work in this breath-taking serial, but for sheer beauty, for unadulterated loveliness, we make bold to say that she has never been equaled upon the screen.

The lines of her face are perfect. Her hair is a thing to be marvelled at. She is so lovely that she is almost sure to become a household word when the serial begins running.

The finest thing that one can say for "The Shielding Shadow" and one thing which is absolutely true, is that it is new It is not only a new serial but it embodies a new idea. All of us are children when it comes to stories. We all love adventure. Adventure is what you get in the "Shadow."

The Pathe people have spent money in the most extravagant manner to make the serial a success. A ship burned at sea is a feature of the earliest episode. With adventure in large doses, and the most beautiful woman in the world (in our judgment) as heroine, you have a photoplay serial which is bound to go over with a swing.

We predict that "The Shielding Shadow" will do more business in Columbus than any serial which has ever played this city.

Protection for Patrons' Eyes

Picture theaters would have more patrons if there were not a considerable number of people who believe that the films are injurious to the eyes. This applies, of course, with some truth to many persons, particularly those whose eyes are not strong.

A writer in the Journal of the American Medical Association tells how the eyes of followers of the screen may be protected. He says:

"The great majority of those who suffer from eye strain after watching moving pictures can find much, if not complete, relief in perfectly fitted glasses. The picture may not be quite so sharp, but this is more than compensated for by the increased comfort.

"For those with very sensitive eyes, a colored glass, either amber, yellowish green or amethyst, may be necessary to give complete relief. There have been put on the market recently several varieties of colored glass, each of which has some advantages, so that some suitable color can usually be secured. A subdued light in the theater is much less irritating than when the only light visible comes from the screen. It is also advisable to avoid sitting in a place where it is necessary to look upward, as the additional strain becomes very tiresome and frequently leaves a headache."

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT
Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

NOTE—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of MOTOGRAPHY, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

The Use of Subtitles

SHOULD you use the term "subtitle" for all reading matter to be thrown on the screen in your scenario, or say "leader," or use the words "cut-in" and "cut-in-leader" where they occur, and how are all of these used? This question, with many variations, seems to be bothering a great many writers who are just starting in the photoplay writing game. They claim that no two model scenarios which they see use these terms in the same manner and they do not know which form to follow.

The real answer is to use whatever will "get your idea across" to the editor in the clearest manner. You have a plot which you think is a good one and you want the film company editor to appreciate that it is good so that your scenario will be purchased. Your one object, then, is to see that he gets that idea just as you intended he should, and all terms and methods used should be employed toward this end. The whole plan of the technique of the photoplay is to allow your ideas to be clearly and readily grasped by the editor and the director, and to aid the writer in getting his story down in such a shape that it will be attractive and understandable. The same rule applies to the use of the various technical terms in working out your continuity. Use all the different phases if they will make the script more easily understood or aid you in expressing yourself more clearly, or use just one or two if you believe this is the better way.

It is difficult to give an arbitrary rule to be followed in the use of subtitles because there is a great difference of opinion among the authorities as to their use. The general rule has been that a subtitle should be used only when absolutely necessary to make the action clear, and we feel that this is generally conceded. The old statement that the perfect photoplay is one without any subtitles or inserted matter has been exploded, and there is no one now who makes any pretense at trying to write a photoplay that will be all action, as such a story would be too transparent in its plot. In view of the standard set for a play at present it is really inconceivable that a plot could be built sufficiently interesting to meet present requirements, and at the same time simple enough so that explanations would not have to be flashed on the screen. The statement can be made, therefore, that there must be subtitles, but the question is: When and where are they justified, and which form is the best to use?

The term subtitle may be used in a general sense to cover all words which are to be thrown on the screen for the audience to read. This, of course, is the simplest method. There are authorities who claim, however, that there are different kinds of subtitles—they have varied duties to perform and each class should have a separate name to designate just what it is intended to convey. They have, therefore, divided the subtitle into four classes:

1. Leader or subtitle.
2. Cut-in-leader.
3. Cut-in.
4. Insert.

Let us look into the special functions which each of these different divisions are asked to perform.

1. LEADER OR SUBTITLE

The leader or subtitle—these terms are synonymous and may be used interchangeably in this sense—is a sentence flashed on the screen at the beginning of a scene to explain some action in that scene which otherwise would not be clear to the audience. The leader may be used to introduce the characters and to establish relationship between the characters. For example, you might start your scenario by introducing each one of the "leads," as "John Brown, the prosperous lawyer." Or you might introduce the character, show the relationship and at the same time weave a little mystery about one of the characters by your leader, as "Mrs. Brown and her adopted daughter, Helen."

Another function of the leader is to denote the passage of time. This can be done directly by saying, "Two years later"; "That night"; or indirectly to give information as to what has happened during the lapse of time as well as showing the period, as "After the wedding trip they returned to the old homestead"; or "Tiring of the monotony of farm life, John comes to the city to seek his fortune."

Another use is to cover a break in the action where there is no passage of time but the interest is shifted to another thread of the story. For example, we have been following the story of a girl who is to be brought into danger, and then shift suddenly to a gang of crooks and build up suspense by bringing them toward the house where the girl is alone with thousands of dollars hidden in the safe. When the gang of men are flashed upon the screen the audience immediately wonders who they are and what part they are to play. By using a leader, "The gang of thieves hears of the money in the safe," the break is covered, the spectator's mind is prepared for the shift and he is ready to follow the action of the gang until the girl again comes into the story at the house. After they have both been established then it is permissible to flash back from one to the other without using a leader every time.

The leader can also be used to eliminate many scenes by showing continued action. For example, a man and girl may meet for the first time and the author wants to indicate that they continue to meet often until their friendship ripens into love. It would grow monotonous for the audience to see scene after scene where they meet and grow better acquainted and so this is covered by the leader, "Frequent meetings have ripened their friendship into love." Or a man may be accused of committing a crime, but there is no proof to justify his arrest, instead of trying to show all this in action and using up unnecessary footage of film the leader explains it simply by "There is not sufficient proof to justify his arrest."

2. CUT-IN-LEADER

The cut-in-leader performs the same function as the leader, but instead of coming before the scene it is inserted in the scene to better explain the action immediately following, or to break a scene. This does not apply to words spoken by the characters, but is an explanatory statement to enlighten the audience as to the reason for the action in that particular scene. For example, you might have a scene in a library where a number of persons were gathered and a man suddenly enters. You do not want the characters in the scene to know who that man is, but do want the audience to realize, as it will increase their suspense, so you break the scene by using the cut-in-leader, "The brother believed to be dead returns unrecognized." Then the sceen will proceed as before. The audience has been let into the secret, but the characters have not. Of all the different phases of the subtitle there is the least use for the cut-in-leader. In almost every case these screen explanations can better and more forcefully be used as a leader or a cut-in. And in almost every case a cut-in thrown on the screen, while it explains, is much stronger and more dramatic or more humorous as directly spoken by the character than the abstract indirect statement carried by the cut-in-leader.

3. CUT-IN

The cut-in applies to the spoken words of characters. It is inserted in the scenes and used, instead of the leader at the beginning of the scene, to add to the force. The cut-ins may be used to explain action, introduce characters, or take the place of action when it is more economical of film to use the cut-in. Also it has a very strong use in helping to make a tense situation more dramatic or to interpolate added humor into a comedy situation. In a matter of choice between the cut-in-leader and the cut-in, the latter is preferable, as it seems to make less of a break in the action than the formal statement. The cut-in carries a more direct application to the immediate action than the leader or cut-in-leader, and is, therefore, more forceful.

4. INSERT

The insert covers all other reading matter thrown on the screen, as for example letters, notes, telegrams, newspaper items, etc. The insert also helps to make the action clear, takes the place of action and so economizes film footage, and indirectly introduces the characters and describes them. For example, the first scene shows a girl in a room reading a letter. The letter is thrown on the screen, it reads:

> You refused to be guided by your parents and left home to marry that gambler. Now that he has deserted you you cannot return home but will have to support yourself as best you can. MOTHER.

This immediately explains all the past experience of the girl, her present condition, the attitude of the parents toward her, and outlines her future, all of which would have taken many scenes to show on the screen.

These definitions of the functions which the different phases of the subtitles may perform and the examples of how they do this work, gives a general idea of the way in which they can be utilized by the author in his scenario. You can use all four terms or just one or any number you see fit as long as you are sure your meaning is made clear. You are your own best judge in this matter but the wise way is to map out a definite method and stick to it, improving it as you get deeper in the work and see where it can be improved. But have some definite form and use it, for only in this way will you be able to obtain the best results.

In using the subtitles remember that they should be as few as possible and carefully worded to eliminate all unnecessary words. You do not want to make the mistake of using subtitles instead of action because it is simpler and quicker to explain things in this way. A photoplay is a story told in action and the subtitles are to be used only to make that action clearer and stronger.

Wins Universal Scenario Contest

THE Universal Film Company announces that Emmet Campbell Hall of Glen Echo, Maryland, has won a $250 prize for his two-reel drama, "Love's Masquerade," in which Mary Fuller plays the leading role and which was released under the Gold Seal Brand on September 13th.

Early in the summer the Universal announced that in co-operation with the Picture-Play Magazine it would hold a scenario contest for Mary Fuller. Twenty-five thousand scripts were submitted and out of this number two hundred are now being considered by the Universal scenario department at Universal City.

Scenarios came in at the rate of nine hundred a day and the judges were swamped. When the contest closed they found they had eight hundred good scripts. This pile was cut to two hundred; Australia contributed seven; from England came eighteen; Canada contributed more than a thousand; and fifty-four came from Mexico. Harry Cliff, prisoner No. 64791 at Sing Sing, entered ten scripts, two of which are now being considered by the Universal.

Mr. Hall sold his first script seven years ago. He was then working in the civil service bureau of the state department at Washington. His second script landed with Biograph and gradually he began to break into the other companies, including Lubin and Selig. Soon after he received offers from both Biograph and Lubin and accepted the Lubin proposition.

Mr. Hall is the inventor of the "Hall Leader," in which the captions are superimposed over the action. His home at Glen Echo, a suburb of Washington, D. C., has a glass cupola about twelve feet square, in which he does all his work. It is fixed up with a desk and files for his scripts and correspondence, for Mr. Hall is an extremely methodical worker. His working scenarios are written on paper of five different colors, one color for interiors, one for exteriors, one for leaders, one for advice and still another colored paper for synopses and scene plots.

"A Serpent's Tooth," written by S. R. Jones and prepared for the screen by Harvey Gates of the Universal staff, is under production by Director Stuart Paton.

Director Charles Swickard of Universal City has completed "The Lie" in five reels.

The delightful characters of Winston Churchill's well-loved novel, "The Crisis," come to life in the Sherman-Elliott production of the same name, made by Selig.

The realistic battle scenes were re-enacted at Vicksburg.

CHURCHILL TALKS ON FILMS

Author of "The Crisis" Explains How Book Was Written. Director Campbell Proud of His Production of Selig Feature

Winston Churchill, author of "The Crisis," which William N. Selig has just adapted to the screen in a ten-part photodrama, and which is being presented to the public by Sherman-Elliott, Inc., gives his opinion on the artistic worth of motion pictures as follows:

"I am convinced that motion pictures are capable of great development as mediums of entertainment and art and will be of untold educational value provided their proprietors are imbued with a sense of responsibility and refrain from catering to the ignorance, prejudices and sentimentality of the people. I am most anxious to see the productions of motion pictures take their legitimate place as the supplement of worthy novels and worthy plays, for they have a realm into which neither of these can enter.

"It was my interest in the history, character and development of the American Republic that led me to write 'The Crisis' in 1900. I have always regarded Abraham Lincoln as the supreme type produced by American democracy, as more characteristic of the higher qualities and possibilities of our form of government than any other man. His modesty, his simplicity were characteristically American. He developed in the fire of great events. He was a leader and not a follower of the people, formulating and expressing the desires and yearnings of the people in wise, concrete action. He understood the nation as no other American has understood it, and the crisis through which he brought us was focused and dramatized in his own soul.

"The book was an attempt to portray this crisis, and the value of such a novel is that it enables one to visualize, to realize through personalities the conflicts and passions of such a period as the civil war."

Colin Campbell, director of "The Crisis," says that he considers this his greatest production. He gave it the very best that was in him and is willing to stand by his handiwork. Mr. Campbell's hobby is correct atmosphere and in this play Mr. Selig permitted him to take his company to Vicksburg and film scenes called for in Winston Churchill's novel right where the scenes were described in the book. The battle scenes were re-enacted in the National Park at Vicksburg, the entire Mississippi National Guard, officers and all, appear as the Union and confederate forces and some of the old fortifications erected during the real civil war of sixty years ago were utilized.

Two characterizations stand out prominently in the production of "The Crisis," that of George Fawcett who enacts the role of "Judge Silas Whipple;" and Matt B. Snyder who impersonates "Colonel Carvel." Mr. Fawcett has had many years of experience in stage work and Mr. Snyder, although eighty-two years old, is tall and as straight as an arrow.

Bosworth and Marshall Join Lasky

Hobart Bosworth and Tully Marshall, well known figures on stage and screen, have signed contracts with the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company to appear permanently in its productions on the Paramount program. The engagement of these two distinguished actors by Lasky has in itself an element of drama. They were originally engaged by Cecil B. De Mille solely for his great production based on the story of Joan of Arc in which Geraldine Farrar is soon to star. So striking was the work these two players did in that production that Mr. De Mille enthusiastically recommended that they be engaged by the Lasky company for its regular program features, and his suggestion was immediately adopted.

These additions conform with the Lasky policy of constantly enlarging its stock company to embrace histrionic types of every description.

Rothacker Films Poultry Convention

The Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company, Chicago, Illinois, made two series of moving pictures representative of the happenings at the Eleventh Annual Convention of the National Poultry, Butter and Egg Association. These pictures were taken in the morning and shown in the evening of the same day at the banquet of the association, and gave such satisfaction that an official vote of thanks was rendered to the Rothacker Company by the association.

The Rothacker camera crews, under the direction of B. Grenelle, T. H. Miller, Wesley Smith, Harry Birch, E. Linden, W. B. Klingensmith and Mr. Kirchner are busy in different parts of the country making industrial pictures, historical scenes, allegorical photoplays and pictures of the militia on the Mexican border.

"Civilization" to Leave Park Theater

"CIVILIZATION," the big Ince spectacle which registers its three hundredth performance at the Park Theater, Columbus Circle, on October 22, has by force of circumstances to leave that theater the same night. A wealthy syndicate has opened negotiations for the acquisition of the New York State rights of the picture and wants to exploit it in their own way.

Director S. Rankin Drew has practically finished "The Girl Philippa," Robert W. Chamber's popular selling novel with Anita Stewart cast as Philippa.

"The Undertow" Substituted

The title of "The Undertow" has been substituted for "Esther of the People," the Mutual Masterpicture featuring Helene Rosson and Franklin Ritchie, which will be released the week of October 23. The story deals with the struggle of a day laborer to overcome the handicap of humble birth and lack of education while retarded and discouraged by a shiftless wife. It is exceptionally strong.

"Mary, Keep Your Feet Still," is the title of a five-reel photodrama which has been commenced at Universal City.

Mary Miles Minter and Margarita

MUTUAL ANNOUNCES DATES AND TITLES

TWO screen beauties, Mary Miles Minter and Margarita Fischer, are especially featured in the Mutual releases for the week of October 30.

Miss Minter will appear on Monday, October 30, in "Faith," the third of her series of Mutual Star productions produced at the American Film Company studios. The play was written especially for the young star by her director, James Kirkwood. Perry Banks plays an important role and Margaret Shelby, Miss Minter's sister, is also seen in the cast, as are Lizette Thorne, Mrs. Gertrude Le Brandt, Josephine Taylor and Clarence Burton.

"The Pearl of Paradise," a five-part drama, will mark Miss Fischer's first appearance in Mutual Star Productions, and her return to Mutual after an absence of over a year. In the supporting cast appear Joseph Harris, Harry Pollard, J. Gordon Russell, and Beatrice Van.

"Miss Jackie of the Navy," a drama in which Miss Fischer plays the role of a girl masquerading as a boy, formerly announced as the first of Miss Fischer's five-part pictures made by the Pollard Picture Plays Company, under the direction of Harry Pollard, has been postponed until a later date.

Short Length Releases

There will be three dramas of short length released during the week. "Paying the Price," a two-reel Mutual, will appear on Monday, October 30. "Canned Curiosity" on November 2, and "The Eternal Challenge" on November 4. Edwin August appears in "Canned Curiosity" and is assisted by Iva Shepard, William Bailey and Ruth Blair.

Orral Humphrey will appear in two one-reel comedies, "The Last Thrust" and "Spartan Spleen."

"Nearly a Hero," a Cub comedy, will be released on November 3, and Paddy McGuire in a Vogue comedy, "Bungling Bill's Bow Wow," on November 5.

The Mutual's usual weekly output of scenic, current news and magazine material produced by the Gaumont Company will appear on Wednesday and Sunday. Mutual Weekly No. 94 and the split reel-scenic-comic "See America First" and "Kartoon Komic" will appear on Wednesday. "Reel Life," the Mutual's magazine in film, will appear on Sunday.

Mutual's Margarita Fischer Series

The Mutual Film Corporation has announced the titles and dates of Margarita Fischer's series of feature

Below is Edwin August in a new Mutual, "The Law of Nature," and at the right are the pro-German comedians, Kolb and Dill in "Bluff," with Thomas Chatterton.

Selig Completes "The Garden of Allah"

William N. Selig announces that "The Garden of Allah" has been completed and the negative shipped to Chicago for expert cutting and trimming. In this production Helen Ware is starred. She is most ably supported by Thomas Santschi, Eugenie Besserer, Harry Lonsdale, James Bradbury, and others.

Speaking of the picture, Mr. Selig says: "I regard 'The Garden of Allah' as the finest motion picture we have yet produced and it has certainly proven the most expensive. The production has been filmed closely following Robert Hichens' great novel. The scenes in the oasis of the Sahara desert are usually faithful and the bazaars, mosques, and street scenes are massive and of correct atmosphere."

"The Kiss" is Completed

Marguerite Courtot has blushed her last blush and Owen Moore has flicked the last speck of powder from his shoulder, which is another way of saying that the Famous Player production "The Kiss," in which they co-starred under the direction of Del Henderson, is completed and ready for release on the Paramount program October 19.

Fischer in New Mutual Pictures

OF MARGARITA FISCHER SERIES

dramas to be released, beginning in November. The pictures are the product of the Pollard Picture Plays Company, and are being taken under the direction of Harry Pollard at the Exposition grounds at San Diego, California.

"The Pearl of Paradise" will appear on November 4; "Miss Jackie of the Navy," November 30; "The Butterfly Girl" on December 28; "The Knight of Tarquizzi" on January 25; "Birds of Passage" on February 22; and "The Light of Heaven" on March 22. Supporting Miss Fischer, aside from Harry Pollard, are Beatrice Van, Jack Mower, Joseph Harris and John Steppling.

Margarita Fischer and the members of the Pollard Picture Plays Company, with Harry Pollard, their director, recently returned from a trip to the Catalina Islands where they pictured weird primitive scenes for "Miss Jackie of the Navy," the Mutual Star Production, which will mark Miss Fischer's second appearance as a Pollard Picture Play star on the Mutual.

This is the second time the company has been away on a trip to the Pacific Islands, the first time being for scenes in "The Pearl of Paradise," Miss Fischer's drama which will appear on November 2.

In addition to the Catalina scenes in "Miss Jackie of the Navy," there were a large number taken at sea in one of the government's cruisers. It was the first time in motion picture history that pictures had been taken on board a government ship.

Miss Fischer and her company spent several days aboard the vessel.

Some of the most spectacular scenes of this picture, which gives opportunity for the graceful Margarita to pose as a boy, were taken in the fashionable Coronada Beach Hotel. Society matrons were invited to come and bring their friends to act as extras in this picture. Several hundred of California's leading society people, as well as many others from other parts of the United States, were present.

Kolb and Dill Invade Small Town

C. William Kolb and Max Dill, not satisfied to permit their director, Thomas E. Heffron, to construct a small town for them in the studio enclosure at Santa Barbara, for "Lonesome Town," the five-reel drama at which they are now at work, hunted out a small village fifty miles away from the studio and transferred their working base there.

One of those great little situations in American-Mutual's "Philip Holden—Waster," is on the left. The big scene is from American's Mutual star, "Immediate Lee." Frank Borzage is seen directing here; he also plays the lead, opposite Anna Little.

World Series Filmed by Selig

Every play made on the baseball diamond, including preliminary practice, conferences of the managers, the throngs of people seeking seats, these and all other interesting details in connection with the world's champion baseball series will be filmed by a staff of cameramen engaged by the Selig Polyscope Company. There will be a dozen or more of these cameramen on the playing fields working for the Selig Company, which has secured exclusive rights to film the world's series.

The feature baseball film in five or more reels will be released through the twenty-three exchanges in all principal cities operated by the Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay Service.

City Books Walthall Film

The filming of "The Truant Soul," Essanay's seven-act feature for Henry B. Walthall, is now well under way, 150 exterior scenes having been completed and studio work begun. Mr. Walthall, Mary Charleson, his leading woman, Director Harry Beaumont and company have returned from Wisconsin where the out-of-door scenes were taken.

The first booking on the feature has been received from a municipality. Mayor D. E. Smith of Richland Center, Wisconsin, has applied to President George K. Spoor for first run on the superfeature. The city council intend to show it in the municipal opera house. The exterior scenes were taken in and about this little hill town in Wisconsin.

William Russell in Strong Role

William Russell, the virile American-Mutual actor, has played many stirring roles but none more interesting and convincing than that of "Tom Weston" in "The Love Hermit," the Mutual Star production of October 26.

In this drama, Mr. Russell, plays the role of an ambitious young man, finding himself unfairly treated by the girl he loves, who is also the daughter of his employer on Wall street, becomes a recluse from the society of women, and bends every energy to the accumulation of a great fortune.

Both Mr. Russell and Miss Burton are quite at their best in this drama. They are supported by a strong cast consisting of William Stowell, Queenie Rosson, Harry Von Meter and Ashton Dearholt.

Norma Talmadge Veteran Player

SHE'S YOUNGEST SCREEN STAR TO HAVE OWN COMPANY

NORMA TALMADGE, the latest Selznick-Pictures acquisition may be young in years but is not young in experience, for her success as a film favorite has been the result of many years of steady activity in the motion picture studios. Miss Talmadge, however, bears the distinction of being the youngest of all screen stars who have been accorded the honor of being placed at the head of their own companies.

In comparison with some of the screen stars whose reputations have been made over night Miss Talmadge, at the age of twenty, can already be reckoned a veteran camera artist. She first faced a motion picture camera in the Vitagraph studio six years ago and it was her years of varied service in all sorts of minor roles that enabled her, when at last given her real chance, to bloom forth in leading parts equipped with an exceptional technic and fitted to make the most of her opportunity. The result was that within a year from the time she played her first leading role, she forced her way firmly into the hearts of millions of screen followers and became, from the producers' point of view, one of the most valuable acquisitions on the market.

According to Miss Talmadge, her entrance to the film world "just happened." She was a fourteen-year-old school girl in Brooklyn when she saw a photoplay that so impressed her as to create the desire to become a screen actress.

"That's what I want to be," she told her mother and Mrs. Talmadge knew from past experience, that it was all over but the shouting. Anything Norma wanted to be or do she usually was or did and so it happened that the next day Mrs. Talmadge and daughter visited the Vitagraph plant.

It was not a fickle thought that prompted this clever little woman to "go into pictures," as she takes her work seriously, studying every character she essays. She is especially esteemed by photoplay patrons for her ability to play character roles as well as young women straight parts. Her ability does not play understudy to her beauty—and she possesses both attributes in a marked degree.

Miss Talmadge was born at Niagara Falls twenty years ago, and her youth, supported by grease paint, holds out opportunity for her to play child parts, quite as ably as she portrays the role of a mother. A change of dress, a few lines of grease paint put on or taken off, and Miss Talmadge is the child or the elderly woman, as the part calls for.

Miss Talmadge had no previous theatrical experience, except that which falls to the lot of the average girl in school through amateur theatricals. Therefore she is truly a product of the screen—has grown and is growing up with the business.

From the Vitagraph, Miss Talmadge went west to join the Triangle forces and has since been starred in a number of successful dramas and comedies. Her work soon attracted the attention of Lewis J. Selznick, founder of the Clara Kimball Young Film Corporation, who was on the lookout for more stars to exploit along similar lines, and when her contract with the Triangle Company terminated, Mr. Selznick arranged with Joseph Schenck for a formation of the Norma Talmadge Film Corporation and she was added to the list of Selznick-Pictures stars.

Miss Talmadge is now at work on her first Selznick picture, an adaptation of the widely known novel, "The Price She Paid," by David Graham Phillips. This is the first of Mr. Phillips' many powerful stories to reach the screen, owing to the fact that his estate has demanded an almost prohibitive price for the rights to his works. But price does not enter the Selznick idea, as is proven by the purchase of such works as "The Common Law," by Robert W. Chambers, and "The Foolish Virgin," by Thomas Dixon, for Miss Young. Through Mr. Edgar Selden, play-broker, a deal was soon consummated for the rights to Mr. Phillips' great novel.

Pathe News Scores Two Scoops

GLADYS HULETTE TO FEATURE IN "PRUDENCE THE PIRATE"

THE Pathe News again put itself on record by scoring two scoops in two days. At 9 p. m. on October 9 it was showing to the audiences of New York Broadway theaters scenes of the survivors rescued from the vessels sunk by the German submarine U53 off Newport, R. I. The survivors were landed at Newport on Monday morning by the U. S. torpedo boat destroyers which rescued them. A Pathe News cameraman, sent to Newport on Sunday night when the story was first flashed over the wires, was awaiting them, secured his pictures and then rushed them to Jersey City by special messenger.

At Jersey City they were developed, cut, printed and titled at top speed. Prints were delivered before 9 o'clock the same day to the New York theaters showing the news and special mesengers were sent with them to Boston and Philadelphia. In consequence, according to the testimony of the various theater managers who received the pictures, the Pathe News scored a clean beat.

The day before this the Pathe News had accomplished another "scoop" similarly noteworthy. Pictures of the World's Series bastball game at Boston on Saturday were delivered in Jersey City the same night, and were shown in the most prominent New York, Boston and Philadelphia theaters on Sunday.

"Prudence the Pirate" for October 23

"Prudence the Pirate," the Pathe Gold Rooster play to be released on October 23, was written by Miss Agnes Johnston of the Thanhouser scenario department. Gladys Hulette, who so illumined "The Shine Girl," with her youthful charm, stars in this feature also. "Prudence the Pirate" is the story of a little rich girl, who in spite of the chilling snobbishness of her home, refuses to let the sunshine be frozen out of her, and is the friend of everyone, particularly the lowly.

A certain humble member of the cast must not be forgotten—Panthus, widely heralded as the homeliest dog in the world. Panthus is no beauty certainly, but his quaint whiskered muzzle is strangely attractive, and so amenable is he to all requirements of the director that he almost rises to the heights of co-star.

The Pathe News has recently been publishing some very clever political cartoons which have aroused considerable interest.

These cartoons were made under the Bray patents by the Cartoon Film Service, Inc., a new corporation, which has in its employ some of the ablest cartoonists in the country. The Pathe News will be regularly supplied with the product of their studios. At a meeting last week Watson D. Robinson was elected president, John C. Terry, secretary, and Henry D. Bailey, treasurer of the new company.

Mr. Terry, who came from the west to direct and manage Cartoon Film Service, in a "native son." He has been a newspaper cartoonist for sixteen years, during which time he has seen service on the San Francisco Call, the San Francisco Examiner and the St. Paul Dispatch. As far back as 1912 he was making animated cartoons.

"The Shine Girl" Gets Many Repeats

"The Shine Girl," the Pathe Gold Rooster Play in which Gladys Hulette starred, is proving its worth by the many "repeat" bookings which it is receiving.

Manager Fred Wright of the Colonial Theater, Hagerstown, Md., recently wrote a letter to the Pathe Washington office which is characteristic of many received. He says: "We have shown approximately 620 five and six-reel feature productions in our theater, but I am sincere in my statement in claiming that 'The Shine Girl' is decidedly one of the most charming, sweet and entertaining feature pictures we have ever shown. It is a masterpiece from all angles, story, acting, direction and photography. I made a special point to take note of the many compliments from our patrons as they left the theater after seeing this picture and it seemed to be the unanimous opinion of our audience that this picture pleased them as well as it did me. We have received over fifty personal requests for a 'repeat' on this picture, so please advise us as to the first open date. Give us more pictures like 'The Shine Girl.'"

In "The Shine Girl" and "Prudence the Pirate" the Thanhouser Company has produced two classics of their kind. Each was written by Agnes Johnston and directed by William Parke with Gladys Hulette as the star.

An entire village is destroyed by an earthquake in the fourth chapter of "The Shielding Shadow," Pathe's "Wonder Serial" produced by Astra. This episode is entitled "The Earthquake," and will be released on October 22. The interest is becoming more intense with each chapter and this release contains many remarkable scenes.

Clever Advertising of Serial

Newspapers all over the country are co-operating with Pathe branch managers in originating advertising ideas in connection with the serial "The Shielding Shadow."

C. S. Edwards, Jr., manager of the Pathe Kansas City office, arranged with the Kansas City Post to print invitation in its pages to every child to be the guest of the Post at the Twelfth Street Theater. On another page of the paper this coupon appeared:

"This coupon will admit any child under twelve years of age to the Twelfth Street Theater, as the guest of the Kansas City Post to see Ralph Kellard, Kansas City's own actor in a motion picture masterpiece, 'The Shielding Shadow,.' Good only between the hours of 4 and 6 p. m. on October 2, 3 and 4."

Because Ralph Kellard, star in "The Shielding Shadow," has become so popular with the motion picture going public, and also because of his wonderful work in the serial, he is to be featured in a new serial now being produced by Pathe.

"Gloria's Romance" Brings Business

M. E. Smith, general manager of the George Kleine exchanges, now distributing the product of Kleine-Edison-Selig studios, reports big business being done on Gloria's Romance," the motion picture novel featuring Billie Burke.

Some exceptional advertising ideas are being developed by the exchange managers and the exhibitors," remarked Mr. Smith. "One enterprising theater manager provided a number of grocery stores in the vicinity of his theater with paper bags of the usual grocery store variety. On each bag is printed "Trade at Blank's Grocery and don't forget to see Billie Burke in "Gloria's Romance" every Tuesday night at the Pastime Theater."

"The handling of the Klein-Edison-Selig-Essanay feature attractions are bringing many new customers to the exchanges for the Burke novel," continued Mr. Smith. "In one territory alone, more than a hundred new patrons have been secured and of this number nearly half are using the Gloria's Romance picture to complete their evening's program, running Billie Burke as a companion feature to one of the five-reelers from the regular Kline Edison-Selig-Essanay Service."

New Hampshire Joins Exhibitors' League

New Hampshire is one of the forty-nine states in which the legislatures soon to convene are likely to introduce measures hostile to the motion picture industry.

The exhibitors there, heartened by the splendid work of their fellows in New York in defeating for renomination Senator Cristman, author of a censorship bill, have organized to protect their interests and joined the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Lee Ochs, the national president, in reporting the fact to the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry, says it is gratifying to know that the exhibitors all over the country are being awakened to the immediate need of protective organization, that their earnestness and enthusiasm are producing rapid results, as is exemplified in New Hampshire, where the call resulted in practically a full muster of the entire state. The officers selected are among the live-wire class of workers, as follows: President, C. H. Bean, Franklin; vice-president, W. H. O'Neill, Manchester; secretary, A. Lorenzo; treasurer, A. L. Couture, Manchester. Executive committee: Chairman, John H. Barlett, Portsmouth; G. D. Barrett, Dover; E. L. Campbell, Keene; George Pierce; Manchester; Ed. Gilman, Berlin.

Enid Bennett Joins Triangle-Kay Bee

Rarely has the initial work of a new film star aroused the interest that is being accorded the debut of Enid Bennett at the Triangle-Kay Bee studios in Los Angeles. Little Miss Bennett is the special "find" of Thomas H. Ince, who was so impressed by her dramatic talent and photographic possibilities during his recent sojourn in New York that he urged her to return to California and become one of the stars of Kay Bee company.

Enid Bennett, attractive new bundle of emotions added to Triangle-Kay Bee.

York, Western Australia, is the birthplace of Miss Bennett. She is a blonde of the vivacious type with clear, fresh coloring and wide blue eyes.

"It was through meeting Katherine Grey that I came to go on the stage," said Miss Bennett when asked about the incidents that affected her in choosing a career. "My friends gave me a theater party when I was sixteen. I was taken to Perth to see 'The Third Degre,' in which Miss Grey was then appearing. After the performance the star received me in her dressing-room, and was kind enough to help me secure an engagement as Modesty in 'Everywoman' within a few days. My work attracted the attention of Fred Niblo and Josephine Cohan and I became an ingenue in their company, appearing in 'Seven Keys to Baldpate,' 'The Fortune Hunter,' 'The Whip,' 'Excuse Me,' 'Broadway Jones,' and other plays in their repertory."

"I feel that the most fortunate incident in my life, however, will prove to be my meeting with Mr. Ince in New York last summer, as I think motion picture acting is perfectly thrilling, and I am very eager to make good all the confidence that has been placed in me. At present my chief fault is moving too quickly through my scenes, but I am learning to cultivate the necessary repose."

John Charles Joins Fox

John Charles, who has been chief in support of Tyrone Power during the past year, has joined the William Fox photoplays. He will portray the "heavy" in Valeska Suratt's picture. Another member of the Suratt cast will be Joseph Granby.

Romeo and Juliet living, loving again—Harry S. Hilliard and Theda Bara.

THEDA BARA AND HARRY HILLIARD AS CO-STARS

PERFECTION in acting, directing, production, art, atmosphere, "sets" and costumes was the aim of William Fox in his film version of "Romeo and Juliet," that most beautifully pathetic love story ever told. And although the picturization of Shakespeare's play necessarily entailed many times the work, care and expense of the ordinary feature production William Fox will release it on his regular program on October 22.

That the acting is of the best is assured in that Theda Bara portrays the role of Juliet while opposite her appears Harry Hilliard, whose classic features are well suited to the romantic Romeo.

The William Fox film version requires seventy minutes in the unreeling. Everything from the replica of thirteenth century Verona to the costuming of the most unimportant extra is as faithful to detail as a large staff of technical aides could make them after weeks of study.

As a whole, the twenty-nine interior studio "sets" are among the most intricate and realistic erected for any feature production. Exclusive of the numerous scenes in the Italian village, there are thirty-eight exteriors. For "locations," director J. Gordon Edwards took the company to one of the finest estates on the Hudson.

The photoplay has four hundred and thirteen scenes altogether, whereas "Romeo and Juliet" in the original is done in five acts and only twenty-four scenes.

Strong Supporting Cast

Miss Bara has been surrounded with a cast of more than 2,500 persons. The chief characters are played by actors who have long since made their marks, either in the silent or spoken drama, and in many cases in both.

Glen White (Mercutio) and Walter Law (Friar Laurence) were on the stage for years before they entered filmland. Law was with Edna May in "The Belle of New York;" had the lead with Henrietta Crossman in "Mistress Nell;" headed "The Sign of the Cross;" created Glenisted in the stage version of "The Spoilers;" and had the lead in the Murray Hill Stock Company.

John Webb Dillion (Tybalt) played with Viola Allen and James O'Neil.

Einar Linden (Paris) has been successively a grand opera tenor, clown, dancer, stage manager, lib-

"Love and beauty and romance still weave their ancient spell, as in the days when Sapho sang and Helen loved too well." The eternal appeal of the old, old story finds its most popular and ideal expression in Shakespeare's immortal "Romeo and Juliet." rettist, composer, and an actor. He was born in Copenhagen, and appeared in support of Bernhardt, Duse, Mounet-Sully, and at the Berlin Opera House and the Opera Comique, Paris. He is the author of the operetta, "Le Jardinier."

Edwin Holt (Capulet) has been in many Belasco successes.

Alice Gale (Nurse) has a record of thirty years' success with stage favorites including Skinner, Booth, Leslie Carter, and James O'Neil.

Helen Tracy (Lady Capulet), Victory Bateman (Lady Mantague), Elwin Eaton (Montague), and Jane and Katherine Lee, pages, are all also familiar figures to theatergoers.

Forthcoming Fox Productions

For the week of October 30 William Fox will release Madame Bertha Kalich's photodrama of domestic life, "Love and Hate." Stuart Holmes plays opposite Mme. Kalich and Kenneth Hunter, Madeleine Le Nard and the Lee children are also in the cast.

Joan Sawyer's first production for the silent drama has been completed, and in this also appears Stuart Holmes, for the first time in a non-villainous role.

Work on new pictures was commenced by Virginia Pearson and Valeska Suratt. Sidney D'Albrook, who has just joined William Fox, will be seen in the role of a "stool-pigeon" in the Pearson photoplay. Mr. D'Albrook has acted before the camera for several years. Previous to that he did slap-stick in the leading circuses. Kenan Buel is directing the production.

Miss Suratt is acting under the direction of Will S. Davis who made "The Straight Way."

John Charles, who has been chief in support of Tyrone Power during the last year, has been engaged as a William Fox player, and portrays the "heavy" of the Suratt cast.

Violet de Biccari, the little goldy-haired eleven-year-old whose performances in "Under Two Flags" and "The Unwelcome Mother" were lauded by the critics, has been assigned to a part in a film now in work. Miss de Biccari was seen recently in "The Happy Ending," Arthur Hopkins stage production.

Several photoplays are under way on the Pacific Coast studios. Director Richard Stanton has had Alan Hale, Gretchen Hartman and the rest of an unusually large company in and around El Paso, Texas, for a month on "locations," for a story laid on the Mexican border.

Art Acord to Support Gladys Coburn

Art Acord, one of the most famous cowboys in the world and the hero of the "Buck Parvin Series" of photoplays, has signed with William Fox.

The man who holds championships in almost everything in which a cowboy competes, is at work in one of the Fox studios in New Jersey, playing opposite Gladys Coburn in the latter's second photoplay.

Mr. Acord's ability with the lariat, his feats in "bull-dogging," bronco-busting, and trick-riding, combined with a splendid personality, earned him a moving picture engagement with the Selig Company in 1910.

In 1911 he was with Bison; 1912, with Universal; 1914, with Bosworth, in support of Elsie Janis and Fritzi Scheff; and in 1915, with American, as "Buck Parvin." In the years in which he worked in the film world, the "daredevil of the West," as he has been called, has won many trophies of his prowess.

FARRAR PRAISES "JOAN"

Celebrated Diva Very Enthusiastic Over "Joan of Arc" Film. Cecil De Mille Adheres Closely to History in Production

It would seem that no picture could fail to be a success in which the star is so enthusiastic over the character she portrayed as is Geraldine Farrar in her impersonation of Joan of Arc. Speaking of the picture Miss Farrar said: "I can scarcely express the belief that is firm in my heart that this production will really be looked upon as something more than a motion picture—rather in the light of a photographic reproduction of one of the greatest events in the history of the world. No woman has ever lived who in the span of a few short years exerted such an influence and created such a lasting impression on civilization as Joan of Arc. To Joan nothing was impossible. Joan of Arc is the woman Christ of all ages.

The celebrated American diva Geraldine Farrar, as Joan of Arc in Cecil B. De Mille's new drama of that name.

"The past summer has been a revelation to me. For nearly three months many hours every day and sometimes far into the night I have been living this role. We have all watched the story develop from an idea into a massive production. I think Mr. De Mille has done wonderful things and I believe the scenario by Miss MacPherson to be a revelation to those who doubt that a long picture must rely on its spectacular features to the exclusion of its heart interest. It is true that throughout this picture there are various extraordinary spectacles, such as the battle scenes in the siege of Orleans, but one never loses sight of the central figure, her hopes, her ambitions, her disappointments and her failures."

This picture is Cecil De Mille's first attempt at a production of some length. As director general of the Lasky Company he directed a number of five-reel feature photoplays for the Paramount Program, including the three photodramas in which Miss Farrar appeared. In this production, knowing the reverence in which Joan is held by the thousands who have studied and admire her character, Mr. De Mille has been particularly careful to adhere closely to history.

The cast which supports Miss Farrar was selected by Mr. De Mille and includes many well known players, some of whom have starred on the screen in their own right. Prominent among these are Hobart Bosworth, who appears as the hero, Theodore Roberts, Raymond Hatton, Tully Marshall, Wallace Reid, Horace B. Carpenter, Charles Clary, James Neill, Mrs. Lewis McCord and others

Greater Vitagraph's Plans for Year

A POWERFUL LINE-UP OF STARS, STORIES AND PRODUCTIONS OFFERED

THE program which the Greater Vitagraph has planned up to the first of the year includes an E. H. Sothern release, a Lillian Walker feature, and other plays in which Peggy Hyland, Evart Overton, Edith Storey and Marc McDermott will appear.

On October 23 will be given to the public "The Blue Envelope," with Lillian Walker its particular star. This story by Sophie Kerr ran in serial form in the Woman's Home Companion, and was picturized by Helen Duey, editor of the Better Films department of that publication.

"The Last Man," a James Oliver Curwood story, will be the super-feature for October 30. Mary Anderson and William Duncan are co-stars in this production and are supported by Corinne Griffith, Jack Mower and Otto Lederer.

On November 6, Antonio Moreno and Naomi Childers are presented in an original story written and directed by Marguerite Bertsch, entitled "The Devil's Prize."

Vitagraph's second London-made production, "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," featuring Sir George Alexander and Hulda Moore, will go to the public on November 13.

Marc McDermott will make his second appearance on Vitagraph's program in "The Price of Power." Appearing with Mr. McDermott are Naomi Childers, Mother Maurice and a capable cast.

"An Enemy to the King" will be E. H. Sothern's second screen offering. This play, in which Mr. Sothern made his stage reputation, will be released on November 27. Edith Storey appears with Mr. Sothern.

Swinging into December, Lillian Walker will be seen in Irvin Cobb's first photodrama, "The Dollar and the Law." Closely interwoven with its plot is a preachment on thrift, and the film bears the stamp of approval of the American Bankers' Association.

Peggy Hyland was selected for the lead in "The Enemy," a story by George Randolph and Lillian Chester. Associated with her are Evart Overton, Charles Kent and James Morrison. This will be released on December 11.

On December 18 Greater Vitagraph will present "A Rogue by Compulsion," in which Charles Rock and Edna Fulgrath play the important roles.

"The Ninety and Nine," featuring William Courtenay and Lucille Lee Stewart, will be the Christmas day offering.

Moreno Off to Coast

As soon as Antonio Moreno finishes up some scenes with Director Scardon he will start for the Western Vitagraph Studios in Hollywood to join Edith Storey. Mr. Moreno, with Edith Storey and William Duncan, are to be featured in a series of western stories under the direction of William Wolbert. The first release will be "Money Madness," written by Hamlin Garland. The Greater Vitagraph announces that it cannot spare the time necessary for Mr. Moreno to appear in person at the various theaters en route and will have to disappoint the many exhibitors who have requested this.

Exhibitors and Newspapers Co-operate

In addition to the extensive syndicate of newspapers carrying Vitagraph's Mile-a-Minute Motor Series, "The Scarlet Runner," the Western Newspaper Union is co-operating with the Vitagraph V-L-S-E exchange managers and accomplishing great results. Generous installments of the story by C. N. and A. M. Williamson are being supplied to small town newspapers by the Western Newspaper Union and the various V-L-S-E managers are furnishing exhibitors with ideas for advertising Earle Williams in the "The Scarlet Runner" locally. This co-operative plan is working out beautifully with the self-evident result that the local newspapers are satisfied; the exhibitors are pleased with the good crowds they are showing to, and the Greater Vitagraph is receiving the kind of publicity that creates more bookings.

Mr. Webster goes to St. Louis with the best wishes of the entire Vitagraph family because he has gamely fought through an illness that would have seriously handicapped a less ambitious man.

450 Women See "The Chattel"

As a result of an address by Rose Tapley of the Greater Vitagraph Company before the Women's Club of Monticello, New Jersey, upon the relation of the motion pictures to the masses, in which she mentioned that some of the telling points she had made were aptly illustrated in "The Chattel" being shown in their city that evening, four hundred and fifty club women descended in a body upon the Monticello Theater and enthusiastically applauded this Greater Vitagraph release and the work of everybody in the cast, not forgetting Miss Tapley's clever characterization of Mrs. Delavan.

FLORENCE REED WITH BRENON

Mary Garden Will Begin Work With Herbert Brenon in March. Florence Reed Will Appear in "The Queen Mother"

Herbert Brenon, of the Herbert Brenon Film Corporation, announces that he has postponed temporarily the production of "The Lone Wolf," an adaptation of Louis Joseph Vance's book of the same name, which was to be his second production for Selznick-Pictures. Mr. Brenon has been looking around to find just the right type for the star of "The Queen Mother," a powerful drama of the middle ages, and discovered that Florence Reed was available for an immediate engagement. He quickly closed a contract with her and will begin working on this new production as soon as "War Brides," with Nazimova as the star, is off his hands.

Meanwhile, Mr. Brenon has received a cablegram from Mary Garden, stating that she will be returning to America in December. She will fill her engagement with the Chicago Grand Opera Company for the regular season, and in March will begin work under Mr. Brenon's direction in her first photodrama.

In "The Queen Mother" Mr. Brenon has an entirely new theme, so far as the photodrama is concerned. The play deals with the middle ages, the time when the Italian renaissance influenced all art, literature, life and politics of Europe, especially in the countries along the Mediterranean. Luxury and splendor such as had not been known since barbaric times was indulged in by the royalty and nobility, but redeemed from the crudities of ancient times by the fact that there arose a great host of masters in all the arts who, under the patronage of the rich and powerful, produced classics in painting and architecture that are still the despair of their modern worshipers. It was also the period of social and political unrest, court intrigues, and innumerable other complexities.

All this magnificence, however, while it will be reproduced faithfully in "The Queen Mother," will not be permitted to interfere with the carrying out of Mr. Brenon's cardinal principle, that no play is greater than its story, and that spectacles must never be allowed to interfere with the direct telling of the story.

This production completes the Brenon program of Selznick-Pictures until next summer. "War Brides" will be released in November, and "The Queen Mother" and "The Lone Wolf" completed in the course of the fall and winter, so that Mr. Brenon will be free by the time Miss Garden is ready for the great production which he has in contemplation for her. It has been widely reported that "Thais" would be the Garden spectacle, because this was one of her greatest operatic triumphs. This, however, has not been finally decided. There are several other roles for which this most popular of all operatic actresses is equally well adapted, and the selection will not be made until she has consulted with Mr. Brenon after her arrival.

ARTCRAFT STARTS CAMPAIGN

Many Novel Ideas Incorporated in Publicity Campaign For Mary Pickford in the First Artcraft Production, "Less Than the Dust"

Several interesting and unusual novelties of expected business-getting value have been incorporated in the publicity campaign which has been devised by the Artcraft Pictures Corporation for the release of Mary Pickford in "Less Than the Dust" on November 6.

The "special" which is expected to create the most favorable comment is the little volume, "How to Handle Mary Pickford Pictures," written by Wells Hawks. This volume is Mary Pickford's own contribution to the campaign. It expresses her own hopes for the future of her art, as revealed to Mr. Hawks, her personal representative in charge of publicity.

The printing gives the exhibitor a choice of ten artistic styles for billboard advertising. Four styles are stock posters, showing Mary Pickford in new straight poses; the other six comprise the special printing ordered for "Less Than the Dust." More than thirty different styles of still photographs and character poses of Mary Pickford are used in the lobby displays designed for Artcraft exhibitors. An artistic herald, slides, and the usual cuts are available.

The note of novelty in the lobby displays is provided by numerous oil paintings made for Artcraft by well known artists. Several character poses are available on easy rental terms. In addition there are oil paintings of Mary Pickford in straight new poses, which are being obtained by exhibitors as permanent display in their theaters. The mailing lists have been well taken care of with fine reproductions of these expensive oils on small cards.

Completing the co-operative scheme between Artcraft and exhibitor is the press book. There is everything required for newspaper publicity in the twenty-four pages of this volume. Filler paragraphs grow into column special stories for the feature sections. There is a catalogue of cuts and numerous sample advertisements, one of which is furnished free in matrix form for the advertiser who uses large space. The book also contains a complete list of accessories and sample order blank for placing orders with the exchange managers.

That the photoplay film fills a very important place in present-day life, not merely as a means of amusement or education, but as a vital influence paralleling all modern thought and activity, is indicated by the unusual demand which has arisen all through the country for re bookings of "The Black List," the Lasky drama of capital and labor, starring Blanche Sweet, which was released some time ago by this company.

Paramount Presents Marguerite Clark

LOUISE HUFF AND JACK PICKFORD IN BOOTH TARKINGTON'S "SEVENTEEN"

MARGUERITE CLARK'S first appearance on the Paramount Program since the renewal of her contract with the Famous Players Film Company, which showed her intention to remain on the screen rather than succumb to the inducements of the footlights, will be made in "Miss George Washington." This will be released on October 30.

The other feature for this week is "Seventeen," a picturization of Booth Tarkington's humorous masterpiece in which Louise Huff and Jack Pickford co-star. This was produced under the direction of Robert G. Vignola and marks the return of Jack Pickford to the Paramount Program as a member of the Famous Players forces.

In addition to the two features on the program, Paramount will release four single reel features: the 38th edition of the magazine-on-the-screen-Paramount Pictographs. The 39th of the series of "Little Trips Around the World" conducted by Burton Holmes, in which he takes his fellow travelers to view the wonderful Vesuvious volcano in eruption. The Paramount-Bray Cartoon drawn by L. M. Glackens, entitled "Greenland's Icy Mountains"; and Paramount's third comedy, "A Troublesome Trip" produced by the United States Motion Picture Corporation.

The 38th edition of the Paramount Pictographs contains four very interesting subjects, the first of which is "Art and the Etcher" in which Walter Raymond Duff, one of the most skillful etchers in the world consented to pose for the screen and give the public a more intimate idea of how etchings are made.

Another subject is "The Passing of the Cowboy," in which is shown a series of exceptional trick riding and broncho busting features. Among the famous rides shown in the picture are Dolly Mullins, Bert Gudgeon and Buck Moulton.

The other features in this screen magazine are "Fall Sports on Lake Ontario," which were posed for by E. F. Warner, editor of Field and Stream; and the second series of Sculptured Plastiques, executed by the sculptor, William d'A Hopkins. The subject this week is entitled "Everybody's Uncle Sam."

Burton Holmes Shows Vesuvius

Burton Holmes in his "Little Trips Around the World" takes his audience to the Island of Vesuvius, visiting it during the time this volcano is in eruption.

It is needless to say that photography under such circumstances was not only exceedingly difficult and sometimes almost impossible, but frequently dangerous Smoke and steam, falling ashes and the fumes from passing streams of molten lava made conditions for the taking of pictures very unpropitious but a volcanic eruption cannot be staged like a "Feature Picture" so Burton Holmes reproduced the exact sights and scenes of those terrible days in Naples, under the weird conditions which then prevailed.

Two or three towns were totally destroyed by the lava rivers and others by a tornado of cinders which, by the accumulated weight, crushed in walls and roofs as if they were made of paper. Many people were caught and perished miserably; others escaped and are shown fleeing with their hastily gathered belongings, their clothing and hats completely covered with the ashes of this "Hell's snow-storm." People, cattle, pigs, horses, and dogs—everything that can move is hurrying to safety, regardless of everything else, while above and over all, can be seen the giant mushroom of smoke and lava, being shot miles into the air by the convulsed mountain.

Paramount Shown in Smallest Theater

The New England Exchange of the Paramount Pictures Corporation has been congratulating itself lately over the fact that it has been able to serve not only the largest theaters in the communities in its district but also the smallest communities there. There is a little theater at Sterling, Connecticut, where but seven hundred people reside, which is showing Paramount pictures each week. The members of The Wright Club of Sterling are all employed at the only mill in the town, and the officials of the company have taken a great interest in the amusements of the place. The club started a motion picture theater and began by showing any old pictures but they were not successful. Recently they signed up with Paramount and now they are doing great business and making money. Paramount has a large number of small theaters in small communities which show the same pictures that are seen in the larger cities under its program system of distribution.

Ray and Williamson Join Vogue

The Vogue Comedy Company of Los Angeles, which releases through Mutual, has recently added to its directing and scenario staff Al Ray, the well-known magazine writer, actor and director, as scenario editor; and Robin E. Williamson, formerly director of the Vim Company, to direct its productions.

During the last two weeks there have been several changes in the casting at the Vogue studios. Ben Turpin, who has been playing for the past few months in comedies with Rube Miller, will appear with "Bungling Bill," as Paddy McQuire is known, in a series of world-beaters. Robin Williamson will direct this company.

Rube Miller will head his company alone. He will direct as formerly, with the assistance of Henry Kernan.

In the studios supporting cast, members of which are chosen to play with either Paddy McQuire and Ben Turpin or with Rube Miller, as occasion demands, are Lillian Hamilton, Gypsy Abbott, Linna Templeton, Arthur Moon, Owen Evans, the company's daredevil, and the two fat men whom everybody loves, Larry Bowes and E. J. Laurie.

Paddy, with a company consisting of Gypsy Abbott and Arthur Moon, is now at work on Al Ray's first scenario, which finds its setting in a restaurant. Paddy himself is cast as the restaurant keeper.

The Vogue studios are situated in the center of the beautiful grounds that formerly surrounded the mansion of ex-Senator Cole of California. J. R. Crone is the general manager of the company.

Director Henry McRae at Universal City has finished a two-reel comedy, "Parted From His Bride."

Chaplin Exposes Comedy Studios

Charlie Chaplin is going to tell the truth about comedy studios.

ought to be an interesting story—particularly as he proposes to relate it in eloquent action, the Chaplinese kind of action. Mr. Chaplin is now at work upon this comedy within a comedy at the Mutual Film Corporation's studios in Los Angeles.

When Mr. Chaplin gets an idea into his head the only way to get it out is to photograh it—"it" meaning both head and idea. "Behind the Screen," which, by the way is the title of the new and remarkable comedy, is one of those Chaplin ideas.

This next Chaplin comedy is scheduled for November 13.

UNDER SEA PICTURES

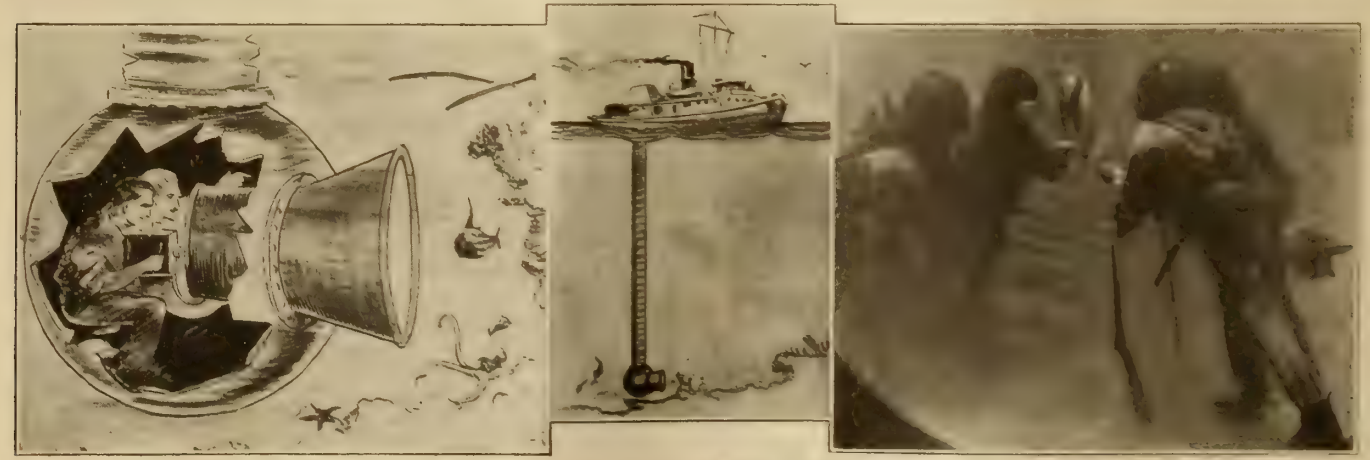
Remarkable Accomplishment of the Williamson Brothers in Constructing Submarine Boat "Nautilus" Exclusively for Film Purposes

The first submarine boat ever made for motion pictures is a fac-simile recreation of the "Nautilus," which was the premier submarine boat to glide through fiction in "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea," dreamed and written by Jules Verne over fifty years ago. Captain Hans Rose recently doubled for Captain Nemo and terrorized the sea with his U boat 83, bringing Jules Verne's dream into a stern reality.

The Williamson brothers designed and constructed the "Nautilus" for the filming of "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea," which they produced jointly with the Universal Company, the Williamsons' part of the contract being that they would operate their undersea picture apparatus, making possible the submarine scenes, and direct and supervise the construction of all submarine props.

The Williamsons' "Nautilus" is a unique "prop." It dives and porpoises like one of Uncle Sam's diver-boats, a periscope conveying to those below the vision of everything occurring upon the surface of the sea as the submarine glides below the surface.

An air lock in the bottom of its hull allows the free passage of diver-actors to pass out to the floor of the ocean.



A real torpedo is fired out of the "nose" of this picture "Nautilus," and she answers her helm and diving rudders and comes to time on all points of submarine construction, creating an epoch-making accomplishment in picture production.

New Loew Theater in Atlanta

Marcus Loew has gone to Atlanta, Georgia, to be present at the opening of a new theater in that city which is the first of a chain of Loew houses that will be built in the big cities of the southern states. The Loew Atlanta Theater seats 2,000 people and is one of the most beautiful and modern houses in the south.

Mr. Loew thinks that the south offers a most promising field for his brand of vaudeville and motion picture shows, conducted in the high-class manner in which the Loew theaters are run. Sites for other Loew theaters throughout the south are now being negotiated for, and soon building operations will be under way in many of the large cities.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New Jersey met the gubernatorial candidate of New Jersey, H. O. Witten, on October 21, at the Robert Treat Hotel in Newark. The questions of censorship and Sunday picture exhibitions were discussed.

Everybody wonders how the Williamson submarine pictures are taken. That's why their films are so real. The first two diagrams above give an idea of the mechanics used by these ingenious "sub-a-marine" photographers. The illustration [illegible] shows the scene as it appears on the screen.

Fashion Series for International

COLORED PICTURES OF MRS. CASTLE DISTRIBUTED BY NEWSPAPERS

THE interest which has been manifested in the fashion films recently released by the International Film Service, Inc., is responsible for "the fashion drama" series which this company is planning, and which will be an innovation in fashion films. Within a few weeks the International will present, in a series of episodes, "The Adventures of Dorothy Dare." Each episode will be complete in one reel and will combine a thrilling story of adventure with a gorgeous display of the latest modes. The title of the first episode of "The Adventures of Dorothy Dare" will be "It's Never Too Late." Mineta Timaye appears in the star part of Dorothy Dare in all the episodes. The supporting cast changes in each episode. H. E. Hancock is the author and director of the series.

Colored Pictures of Mrs. Castle

The first of a series of pictures of Mrs. Vernon Castle, star of the International's preparedness serial, "Patria," appeared on Sunday, September 28, in the leading newspapers throughout the United States. The pictures are printed in five colors, and occupy the entire front page of the illustrated magazine section of the paper.

The series is entitled "Heroines of American History." The first shows Mrs. Castle in the familiar pose of Molly Pitcher; the second depicts Mrs. Castle as Betty Ross; the third as Molly Stark; and the fourth as Patria Channing, the modern American heroine of "Patria," who sacrifices so much for her country.

Six New Branches of International

The great demand for the International releases has made it necessary to open new branches to take care of the increase of business, and it is planned, therefore, in accordance with its policy of expansion, to open six new branch offices in different parts of the United States.

J. K. Burger, assistant general manager of the International, has arranged for opening branches in the following additional cities: Cleveland and Cincinnati Ohio; Seattle, Wash., which will cover all of the northwest; Kansas City, Mo.; Des Moines, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebraska. The International already has branches of the New York headquarters in Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Atlanta, St. Louis, Los Angeles and San Francisco. In addition it has agencies in Buffalo, Albany, New Orleans, Kansas City, Minneapolis, Indianapolis, Detroit and Salt Lake City.

The opening of two offices in Ohio and the northwest by the International is of particular importance and means that the concern is to make a determined fight for business in these districts.

Evelyn Fariss, who, although only eighteen years old, is already known to screen and legitimate audiences, has joined the forces of the International Film Service, Inc. Miss Fariss will appear in several episodes of "Beatrice Fairfax" in support of Harry Fox and Grace Darling.

News Pictorial Locates Lost Son

The Hearst International News Pictorial has performed another service to humanity in locating a missing son long believed dead. Six years ago Earl Biescker of Knoxville, Pa., joined the United States navy. When his term of service expired he joined the British army and up to six months ago his family heard from him regularly. But since that time they lost all trace of him and gave him up as lost.

The Hearst Pictorial of the burial of the Zeppelin dead in England was shown at the Olympic Theater, Pittsburgh, last week, and one of the Biesckers' neighbors was startled to see Earl as one of the casket bearers. After staying to see the film the second time to be sure there was no mistake, the friend hurried to tell the mother of the boy. She came to the theater and almost collapsed with joy when she saw her son alive on the screen. The father of the boy sent a letter to the British war office, relating the circumstances, and believes in this way he will be able to again get in communication with his son.

Grace Darling Patents Features

Because of the attempts of many other motion picture actresses to "make up" to resemble her, Grace Darling, the International star, has made application to the Register of Patents at Washington, to have her features protected by patent. This is believed to be the first time on record that such action has been taken and its outcome will be watched with interest by other persons in public life who have similarly suffered. A sculptor will make a replica of Miss Darling's features, which will be placed on file in the patent office if the application is granted.

Since her appearance in the title role of the International's photo-play series, "Beatrice Fairfax," Miss Darling has won an unusual amount of popularity with the consequent number of imitators.

In the application to the Register of Patents it is recited that Miss Darling "has become so prominent throughout the country because of her appearance in a number of pictures that many women are attempting to make up to represent her, thereby taking away a certain amount of her value."

Plays "Who's Guilty" in Five Houses

Irving C. Ackerman, of Ackerman & Harris, the prominent western vaudeville managers, has written to the Pathe Company congratulating it and the Arrow Film Corporation upon the "Who's Guilty?" series which Mr. Ackerman is playing in five of his theaters. His letter in part follows:

> We are using your "Who's Guilty?" series in the following Hippodrome theaters of our circuit: San Francisco, Oakland, Portland, Seattle and Spokane. Now that the series is nearing an end we desire to state that we consider each story extra good and stronger than its predecessor. The acting, photography and detail are, in our opinion, equal to most of the longer features now on the market.
> When you are in position to furnish us a similar series we are ready to use same on the entire Hippodrome circuit.

Lasky Presents Prize Picture

It is not very often that eight separate stars are presented on the screen in one month by one company, but that is the record of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company for the month of November. The stars include Fannie Ward, Thomas Meighan, Anita King, Sessue Hayakawa, Myrtle Stedman, Blanche Sweet, Cleo Ridgely and Wallace Reid.

The fact that the name of Myrtle Stedman is included in this list is particularly interesting, in view of the fact that she has been a Pallas-Morosco star for some time. In this case she has been loaned to Lasky by the Pallas-Morosco Company.

In the order of their release dates the pictures are as follows: November 2, "The Heir to the Hoorah" with Thomas Meighan and Anita King; "The Soul of Kura-San" with Sessue Hayakawa and Myrtle Stedman, announced for the 6th; Blanche Sweet in "Unprotected," scheduled for the 13th; Fannie Ward in "The Years of the Locust," designated for the 16th, and Cleo Ridgely and Wallace Reid in "The Yellow Pawn," which is to be released on the 23d.

NANCE O'NEIL IN "GREED"

Third Play of McClure's Serial "Seven Deadly Sins" Presents Celebrated Actress Supported by Four Leading Men

One leading man and one leading lady are the usual quota of most film productions but an unusual feature of the forthcoming McClure Pictures series, "Seven Deadly Sins," is that each star as she appears in her particular part of the series, is supported by several leading men of unusual dramatic ability.

In "Envy," the first play of the series, the star, Ann Murdock, is supported by three sterling actors, Lumsden Hare (related to Sir John Hare) an actor who did notable work with Maude Adams when she appeared as Joan of Arc in the Harvard Stadium; Robert Cain, of the famous Drew family, whose work in this and other plays has been of the quality to be expected of a Drew relation; and versatile George Le Guere.

In Greed," the third play of this super series, Nance O'Neill is acting with Robert Elliott, whose work with Margaret Illington in "Within the Law," helped largely to make that play the wonderful success it was. Mr. Elliott was the featured lead opposite such well-known legitimate and screen stars as Ethel Barrymore, Alice Brady, Marguerite Snow and Irene Hawley.

The heavy part has been entrusted to the care of Harry Northrup, who was one of the first legitimate stars to recognize the possibilities of the motion picture field. Some of his most recent pictures were "The Test," "The Christian," "My Lady's Slipper," and "The Painted World."

Alfred Hickman, Nance O'Neill's husband, is also in the cast of "Greed." Mr. Hickman began his work with Sir Henry Irving and came to America with Augustin Daly. He played the young Count in Belasco's "The Lilly," in which Miss O'Neill achieved her greatest success. He will be remembered for his recent work in "The Witch," "A Woman's Past," and "The Iron Woman." For the past three years Mr. Hickman has been Miss O'Neill's leading man and producer of her plays, besides supplying scenarios for her.

George Le Guere forms the last member of this notable quartet of actors; his work for Metro, Famous Players; Kleine, Essanay and on the legitimate stage has made him a staunch favorite with the amusement loving public. "Greed" was produced under the direction of Theodore Marston.

Shirley Mason, the sixteen-year-old leading woman of McClure Pictures, has become a "Little Sister of the Soldiers" and wants every girl in America to correspond with the soldiers in the various European war zones—in a sisterly fashion, of course. Miss Mason believes this would do much to brighten the lives of these soldiers and all you have to do to become a "sister" is to adopt some soldier as a correspondent. Miss Mason has already mailed her first letter and likewise a package of good-cheer.

New Essanay Releases

The first five features to be offered by Essanay through Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay Service are as follows:

"The Return of Eve," is scheduled for October 16. This play is in 5 acts and features Edna Mayo, supported by Eugene O'Brien. On November 6, "The Prince of Graustark" will be released. This is a sequel to George Barr McCutcheon's "Graustark," each among the best selling novels ever written. Bryant Washburn and Marguerite Clayton appear in the leading roles, with Ernest Maupain and Sydney Ainsworth heading the support. "The Chaperon" will be offered in five acts on November 20. It features Edna Mayo and Eugene O'Brien.

Unless plans are changed, all of the later chapters of "A Lass of the Lumberlands," the fifteen-episode drama of the big woods and big business which the Signal's Helen Holmes Company is filming for distribution by the Mutual Film Corporation, will be made in the wonder region of the Yosemite Valley, in Northern California. The company is now quartered at El Portal, the southern gateway to Yosemite National Park. The country affords no finer scenery, and atmospheric and climatic conditions are said by Director J. P. McGowan to be superb.

The Universal Joker Company, working under the direction of W. W. Beaudine, is filming "Lashed by Love," in one reel. The leading comedy roles are played by Gale Henry and William Franey. Lillian Peacock, who enacts the part of a young man had her right foot slightly injured but fortunately not until she was playing her last scene.

Alice Brady in Seven Features

WORLD STAR HOLDS RECORD OF ONE NEW ROLE EVERY MONTH

ONE new role every month in a film production is some feat when it is considered that the process covers a long stretch of time and is not operated under special pressure. This, however, is the record which Alice Brady, star of the World Film Corporation has to her credit.

Miss Brady is featured in seven of the picture plays to be released by the World Film Corporation before the end of May, 1917. These are "Bought and Paid For," "A Woman Alone," "The Girl and the Wager," "Darkest Russia," "The Madness of Helen," "Sinners," and "Frou Frou.'

"Of course this is hard work," said Miss Brady. "Not in spots, but regularly, without the slightest break. I should call it inexorable, for its exactions are never relaxed. But it is wonderfully stimulating, for the variety is entirely unlimited, and you go from one role to another like roaming through some vast building with an endless number of rooms, all different and each one with something in it to fasten the interest.

"When I was very new to the speaking stage I realized that I lacked experience, and I thought the best way to acquire it was to join a stock company where they changed the bill every week. So I played all summer in Dayton, Ohio, appearing in a new role every Monday and beginning to rehearse another every Tuesday morning.

"This seemed to me to be great experience at the time, but as I look back I doubt if it was of any special benefit, excepting that it may have given me confidence and familiarity with the technical side of my profession. But as for any considerable help, the drive was too great and too aimless.

"The plays were changed so often that we scarcely knew one of them before we were plunging into another, and of course we fell into a rut in spite of ourselves. And then, if we were imperfect, in our lines, we 'sensed' them as best we could, and slipped through somehow.

"This cannot be done in the pictures. One phrase may be made to do duty for another in the speaking drama, but you cannot make a substitute expression of action take the place of the real thing. In other words it is impossible to slur a scene or any portion of a scene in the pictures, because the camera is sure to catch you at it if you try.

"On account of this the picture player must be on his or her mettle all the time in order to succeed, which means that the interest is keyed up every instant. If this lets down the whole scene is gone and must be made over, which does not improve your own temper or those of the other actors and the director.

"This is what I meant by describing the work as inexorable. On the other hand it is satisfying in a great many respects. For one thing the pictures give us opportunities to see ourselves as others see us, and incidentally to study our own imperfections. On the speaking stage we have to take the word of the critics or our friends regarding the value of our work. On the screen we have ample opportunity to judge for ourselves—so that if we do miss the applause there are other advantages which overbalance it immensely."

Prize Winners Announced in January

William A. Brady announces that the $5,000 prize contest of the World Film Corporation closed September 15, and the formal announcement of the winning authors will be made January 1, 1917. There will be nineteen manuscripts accepted, the one considered best among these will take the first price of $1,000; the second best $750; the third $650; fourth $500; fifth $400; sixth $300; seventh $200; next twelve $100 apiece.

Paramount Promotions

With the resignation of Wallace Thompson as director of publications, and advertising for Paramount the officers of the corporation promoted a number of the men who had served under Mr. Thompson and have given them the full responsibility of their departments, which had been under his jurisdiction. Charles C. Burr, was named manager of the advertising department; Charles E. Moyer, manager of publicity; Harry I. Day, editor of Picture Progress, a monthly magazine and Paramount Progress, Paramount's weekly exhibitors' house organ; William Hurst, managing director of the Paramount Pictographs; and a new sales promotion department will be inaugurated immediately under the direction of Manager Hodkinson and William W. Hines.

Practically all of the new managers of the different departments have grown up with the organization and were employees when it was still in its infancy a year and a half ago. They have all been educated along the principles and standards that Paramount has erected in its distribution of better pictures for better theaters and a better public and have been the working heads of their different departments for nearly a year. Their principal work is now confined to helping Paramount's every exhibitor throughout the country to place his pictures before the public upon a Paramount standard.

Decision in Fox-Brenon Case

The following is the final decision on the "War Bride's Secret" legal action mentioned at the bottom of page 943 in the October 21 issue of MOTOGRAPHY. The action was caused by the similarity in the titles of Brenon's "War Brides" and Fox's "The War Bride's Secret."

Brenon Film Corporation, Selznick Film Corporation vs. William Fox and Fox Film Corporation:

Decision by Honorable Francis K. Pendleton, Supreme Court.

This is a motion for an injunction pendente lite.

A perusal of the voluminous affidavit does not satisfy me that an attempt was made to deceive or mislead. The motion will, therefore, be denied, defendants stipulating at the hearing to go to trial before a Referee on two days' notice and proceed from day to day.

At a trial all the facts can be shown and the rights of the parties could be better determined.

The tenth episode of "Liberty, A Daughter of the U. S. A.", featuring Marie Walcamp with Jack Holt playing opposite, has been completed at Universal City by Director Jacques Jaccard. He will commence work immediately upon the eleventh installment of the big serial.

Triangle November 5 Releases

Dorothy Gish and Bessie Barriscale are the stars of the Triangle feature releases for the week of November 5. Miss Gish appears in a Fine Arts production recently produced under the direction of George Siegmann. Miss Barriscale is the heroine of a rollicking Irish comedy written especially for her by C. Gardner Sullivan and produced at the Kay Bee studios under the direction of Charles Miller and Thomas H. Ince.

In "Atta Boy's Last Race," Miss Gish has been provided with a part which gives her the opportunity to exert her well-known charm amid the picturesque surroundings of the race track.

In "A Corner in Colleens," Bessie Barriscale romps through five reels of laughing drama of the school of Lover and Boucicault. The eldest of four orphaned colleens—known as the prettiest in Ireland—the heroine of this story is an incorrigible tomboy.

FOX SPECTACLE AT LYRIC

Lyric Theater, New York, Being Redecorated for Opening of William Fox's Fantasy "A Daughter of the Gods."

To harmonize with the William Fox elaborate spectacle of "A Daughter of the Gods" the Lyric Theater, New York, in which the picture will first be shown, is being entirely redecorated for the opening which will take place on October 17. Some examples of Eastern art in the form of stage settings will be installed and will be keyed in harmony with the lavish colors of the play. Some alterations of importance will be made in the projecting of the picture under the direction of John H. Zanft. An entirely new staff will be installed in the theater and beautiful novelties in costume will be displayed by the ushers.

Second in interest only to the production itself is the accompanying score of Robert Hood Bowers, who will direct an augmented orchestra for the occasion.

Annette Kellerman is the star in this fantasy and probably no other player could have met the requirements of such a role. Astonishing virtuosity is displayed by her as an actress, dancer, swimmer, diver, fencer and acrobat. Other principals in the company include Stuart Holmes and Jane and Katherine Lee.

The William Fox Company of players went to Jamaica, West Indies, in August, 1915. The exteriors, marines, water falls, pageantry and battles of "A Daughter of the Gods" were staged in and around Kingston. The picture was finally completed in September of the following year and measures ten reels or 10,000 feet in length. Motion picture experts are of the opinion that "A Daughter of the Gods" is one of the most costly and most numerously peopled cinemas yet created, the cost of the production having reached to seven figures and employed no less than 20,000 persons all told.

Child Criticises Make-Up

William Fox has undoubtedly the youngest critic in the moving picture business. The critic is just a little more than four years old. The critic's name is Jane Lee. And the only person Jane criticizes is her mother, Mrs. Irene Lee, who made her screen bow a fortnight ago.

The director and every one else were perfectly satisfied with Mrs. Lee's work, but Jane, the veteran of ten films, just threw up her little hands and shook her head sadly.

"Oh, mother, your make-up is terrible, terrible," she said.

Gaumont Shows Life of Star

The great interest the public evinces in its motion picture favorites is to be gratified by the Gaumont Company in the case of pretty little Mary Miles Minter. The popular young actress who is now so prominent in Mutual Star Productions will be shown both at home and at the studio in "Reel Life" Number 23. This issue of the Mutual Magazine in Film will be released October 8. The section of the reel devoted to Miss Minter is called "A Day With Mutual's Youngest Film Star."

How would you like to travel a couple of thousand miles in order to arrange for future features for your house? W. H. Thompson, manager of the Dream Theater of Juneau, Alaska, has just returned home after spending a few weeks at Seattle, Washington, and other cities on the Pacific coast. He took back with him a number of films and a long list of bookings to please the patrons in the land of the midnight sun.

Here are two of the Jamaican scenes from Fox's "A Daughter of the Gods," the elaborate spectacle which was first unrolled to public gaze at the Lyric Theater, New York, October 17. Annette Kellerman, the fearless amphibian star of the production, is on the right

Selznick Shows Value of Open Booking

"ONE HUNDRED PER CENT PICTURES" IS POLICY

LEWIS J. SELZNICK sums up his policy for the Selznick-Pictures in the statement:

Lewis J. Selznick.

"I have surrounded myself with persons of culture and refinement. Great artists make the sets for all of our pictures; noted technical experts are in charge of each of the important subdivisions of production. I am seeking only the biggest directors to handle our various companies. I am not buying or seeking scenarios from immature, unknown or even moderately well known writers. Every element entering into my pictures must be a 'star' element.

"No exhibitor has to take my pictures under a program system. I will shortly be producing fifty-two pictures a year—one each week; but this does not mean a program. It means fifty-two super-pictures, worth every penny of the advanced rentals that will be charged for them."

Mr. Selznick is a staunch advocate of the open booking policy and claims that the doom of the program system is close at hand. He believes the motion picture has passed the novelty stage and it no longer draws huge crowds simply because it is a new form of diversion. The crowds are attracted now only when one of the popular idols of the screen is appearing or when some great spectacular production is being shown.

Having tried out both methods during the course of his career in the motion picture industry, Mr. Selznick feels that he is well qualified to judge between the merits of the program and the open booking system. He sums up the program system as a plan by which the exhibitor is forced to "pay the same price for gold, silver, brass and tin. If the pictures given on the program were all of an equal value it would be a different matter, but every exhibitor knows," says Mr. Selznick, "that by this method he never gets more than one or two pictures a month that really appeal strongly to the people. Manufacturers working under the program system have assembled around them a variety of men and women players, some stars, and some barely known to the American picture-loving public. They offer the films in which these players appear to the owners of theaters at a rental under a rigid contract system whereby big stars and picture small-fry are booked at identical prices."

Under the open booking system the exhibitor will be given a chance to pick his big attractions and play them when he chooses. Under this system the producers would be forced by competition to put their best efforts into every individual production. Open booking would force every exhibitor to improve the character of his house and program and thereby materially increase motion picture patronage. Mr. Selznick contends that the open booking system is the only thing that will save the industry from going on the rocks.

With his own pictures Mr. Selznick is living up to the ideal which he advocates in the open booking plan. The organizations working as a part of the Selznick-Pictures are the Clara Kimball Young Film Corporation, the Herbert Brenon Film Corporation, the Kitty Gordon Film Corporation and the Norma Talmadge Film Corporation, and several other important units each headed by internationally known men or women stars will be added.

The first production offered by Selznick was Clara Kimball Young in "The Common Law," a fair sample of what is meant by the "100 per cent pictures" to be offered by this company. Next will come Nazimova in "War Brides," produced by Herbert Brenon, unquestionably a great genius among directors. Kitty Gordon's first offering will be in "Vera, the Medium," by Richard Harding Davis. This picture is being produced by G. M. Anderson (Broncho Billy). Clara Kimball Young is now at work on her second production which will be an adaptation of "The Foolish Virgin," by Thomas Dixon.

"Civilization on State Rights"

"Better than program stuff," is the demand of exhibitors all over the country. Programs have been shot to pieces; and this applies to five-reelers as well as the ones and twos. The machine-made picture, produced against time, no longer attracts the public. "Nothing is too bad for them," appears to have been the trade slogan of some of these program purveyors, and the result is, to quote Freuler, that there is $500,000,000 sunk in the business and not earning dividends. They've killed the goose that laid the golden egg.

"Civilization," which took a year to make, is still making its way on the state right market. The economics of the matter easily sustains the basis of argument that there will not be another big film production available for state right bargaining for a long time to come, maybe two years. Nobody's making one, to our knowledge. Hence, "Civilization" holds the field.

Meanwhile, up at the Ince offices in Times Square, New York, the auction game goes merrily on. There are two or three groups of men dickering for the Ohio rights and it is expected that a conclusion will be arrived at before long.

The picture meanwhile is being cut and titled for the various markets and the story will ultimately be translated into the principal languages of the world. Japan, India, Russia and Sweden are inquiring after it; and the probable prolongation of the European war until 1918 underwrites its money-making possibilities to the limit.

"The Love Hermit"

Five-Reel American Drama Released October 26. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS number of the series of pictures starring William Russell is one of those plays which will appeal to an audience of a certain class and displease one of another. A conscientious reviewer feels called upon to sound a note of warning against it to an exhibitor who caters to a fastidious audience. On the other hand, uncritical, sensation loving audiences are going to like it. It would be as unfair to condemn the play, judging it by higher standards as it would be to overlook its unpleasant episodes.

The theme of the play is a good one and affords Mr. Russell a strong role. But in working it out, probability and good taste are sacrificed at many points. In their stead overdrawn situations and sensationalism have been substituted. If your audience prefers the latter elements to the former, this is the play for them. But don't expect a keen, intelligent audience to enjoy greatly a series of love scenes which can best be described as "slushy," accompanied by subtitles of the same sort; a heroine whose conduct is so caddish that she forfeits sympathy though in the last act she declares she is sorry; and at least one episode, that of the roadhouse, which is the sort of thing best avoided unless the dramatic value of the play absolutely requires it, and in this case it is so obviously dragged in that its only effect is to arouse a feeling of annoyance at the poor taste of the producers.

Russell's acting is good. The role gives him plenty of opportunity. Charlotte Burton's role is a difficult one and in spite of her efforts, not very convincing or pleasing. The rest of the cast have typical roles which they interpret easily. The players are William Stowell, Harry Von Meter, Queenie Rosson and Ashton Dearholt. Photography and settings are good. Clarke Irvine is the author of the story.

The Story: Tom Weston (Russell) is invited to the home of his employer, James Bolton, a wealthy financier, in whose esteem he ranks high. Tom falls in love with Bolton's daughter, Marie, and for several days the two carry on an affair of some intensity. But Marie is engaged to marry Hillman, a youth of her own social set, and when her father and Hillman chance upon Marie and Tom in a close embrace, Marie puts the blame upon Tom, declaring that he had taken advantage of her and that she cared nothing for him. She allows Tom to be misjudged by her father and to lose his position.

Tom, embittered by the discovery of the evil nature of the girl, determines to treat all women as Marie had treated him. A number of episodes show his methods of playing upon his feminine companions the same sort of trick Marie had played upon him.

Then Marie, overcome by remorse, begs forgiveness from Tom and he grants it apparently, intending to win her love fully, then cast her aside. He also brings her father to the verge of financial ruin. When Marie, instead of reproaching Tom or pleading for her father, declares that he is justified in punishing him and that she loves him anyway, Tom believes her truly repentant, forgives her and again gives her his love.

The Essanay-Chaplin Revue of 1916

Released October 21 by Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay. Reviewed by G. Harris

THIS "revue," which is five reels, is a clever method of reissuing three of the two-reel Essanay Chaplin comedies. "The Tramp," "His New Job," and "A Night Out" have been put together, cut to five reels and supplied with connecting subtitles to form a continuous narrative. For a Chaplin-loving audience, this arrangement should prove a delight, providing them with five reels of mirth. The offering is packed with comedy business which Chaplin-fans enjoy and, unless the viewers grow exhausted from laughing, we do not believe the five reel version can be called tiresome. Those who have seen the episodes before will not be averse to enjoying them again in a slightly different context. As the trade showing of the arrangement, the larger number of exhibitors present were familiar with the original comedies and the most frequent remark seemed to be a delighted "Oh, I didn't remember this!"

While a detailed description of the scenes would perhaps be superfluous, an outline of the action may recall the comedies and give a suggestion of the five-reel arrangement.

The Story: Charlie is introduced as "The Tramp," driven by hunger to breakfast on grass, when fortune favors him by making him the hero of the rescue of a farmer's daughter (Edna Purviance). In gratitude, the farmer gives food to the starving tramp and offers him a job as farm hand. The number of amusing mistakes, the various phases of farm labor lead Charlie into is unlimited. Incidentally he falls in love with the farmer's daughter, but since she is in love with someone else, Charlie leaves the farm and goes to the city, where the girl's sister lives.

In the city, Charlie applies for a position with a motion picture company. The interior of a picture studio supplies the fun-making material of this part of the play, and the leading supporting role is taken by Ben Turpin as the property man.

The third adventure is arranged from "A Night Out" and in it Chaplin and Turpin discover various sorts of trouble

"The Fable of the Kittenish Superanns and The World-Weary Snips"

Essanay Two-Act Version of George Ade Fable. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

ALL that is required of this picture is that it keep up to its subtitles. The comedy is a cleverly arranged accompaniment to a George Ade "fable in slang" told in the captions. While it is safe to say that these captions, in the inimitable phrasing of the famous humorist, will win the laughter, the screen comedy itself is well acted and well photographed. The contract between the gay party enjoyed by the elder guests and the gloomy event in which the young people played their parts is well brought out. The action of the story is exaggerated only enough to be effective. The offering, released October 17, is witty and entertaining.

The gloomy dinner party.

The Fable: A cove with the flossy label of Adelbert Justitian came back to dazzle the Townsmen with the wampun he had gathered. He learned that he would be expected to pull a few house parties. The first week-end session was to be a Peace Conference for the antique Quakeydoodles and Spectacled Hens. But the second party was to be a Hurrah Jubilee for the way Debutantes and Blithe Lads from the Varsity. The Sears and Yellows arrived and from the first tap of the Gong the bridles were off. The female members of his old Sunday School class began to blow cigarette smoke out of their eyes, ears and nose. Before he could suggest prehistoric euchre, the loud needle was at work on the ragamaphone. A. J. saw reputable women with grandchildren get right out in the middle of the floor and slap Father Time in the face. The old ones arose Monday all freshened up after having slept a grand total of 6 hours since Saturday night. With such exuberance A. J. feared that the rollicking Juniors, due the following week, would put his home on the Fritz. When the buds and striplings came he found himself surrounded by pale young woman and gloomy he-whiffets. They hunted dim corners and lapsed into death-chamber conversations. A. J. tried to figure out why so many young lives had been clouded. On Monday the chastened host was glad to get them all off the place.

"She Loved a Sailor"

Spirited Triangle-Keystone Comedy. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IN "She Loved a Sailor" the astonishing tricks they make the camera do out there at the Keystone studio are combined with a specially good scenario and good acting. This can bring about only one result, and that is a two-reel comedy whose really good fun will add volumes of pleasure to the evening's entertainment at the picture theater.

Groups of whiskered and frock-coated gentlemen running about on the surface of an expansive body of water, an aeroplane with two men dangling at the end of its anchor-rope as the machine travels swiftly above busy city streets and numerous other startling stunts incorporated to such amusing effect in "She Loved a Sailor" make one wonder, persistently wonder, at the ingenuity of the director responsible for their accomplishment. But while "She Loved a Sailor" shows many bits of remarkable photographic effects, it is not this wonder that accounts for the appeal of the picture—it is really funny.

Claire Anderson, Shorty Hamilton, Harry McCoy and the other members of the cast score personal successes. The story is about a girl who works as stenographer in the office of a ship owner. She is in love with the captain of one of the vessels and she means to save him when she hears her boss and his son plan to blow up the boat to collect the insurance. In saving him she is aided by an aeroplane and the water-shoes of the inventor whose office is across the hall. In bringing this all about there are many big laughs and continual amusement. "She Loved a Sailor" is an exceptionally fine Keystone offering and it will be hailed with gales of laughter throughout the land.

"Life's Shadows"

Metro Release Produced by Columbia Pictures. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A COMEDY with a quite active romantic adventure in it is "In The Diplomatic Service," a Metro offering in which Francis X. Bushman makes his latest appearance. Mr. Bushman is credited with making the screen adaptation of this play from a story by John C. Clymer and Hamilton Smith, as well as the direction of the production. Mr. Bushman's direction is in the main effective, but one must confess that the comedy attempted in the Mongolian man servant's dilemma over a pair of white trousers which have become stained, fails utterly. This bit of business is held for such a long space that it almost makes one laugh in a manner that comes near to being hysterical.

"In the Diplomatic Service" moves quickly and the romantic portion of it is attractively taken care of by Mr. Bushman and Miss Bayne. To those who have earned the right to be called "Bushman fans" the offering needs no recommendation. Considered apart from its attraction owing to the star, it may be said to be quite entertaining and wholly pleasant.

The story turns about a wealthy young man who sets out to trap a certain representative of a foreign government whose operations in Washington are suspected, but nothing can be proven against him. Stansbury gets his man and in doing so he has a thrilling adventure and in the end wins a charming girl. The settings are splendid and the photography —unlike the majority of recent Metro offerings—is very good.

This play was written and produced by William Nigh. It is a story dealing with the hypocrisy in a small town named Purity. Martin Bradley, lawyer and the holder of the office of town clerk, is a drinking man and the people of Purity have little use for him. Martin is big hearted. He is the benefactor of two young women who are alone in the world and a young man of the town. After a series of melodramatic complications, Martin wins the admiration of the townspeople.

"Life's Shadows," made by Columbia for Metro.

Mr. Nigh's characterization is very good. Both in his scenario and the portrayal of the part Mr. Nigh has succeeded in making Martin a character of interest-compelling qualities. Irene Howley plays leading feminine role, and she, too, gives a performance of merit.

The atmosphere of the production is pleasing and the players all give commendable interpretations. "Life's Shadows" is a picture whose central character is amusing and life-like. The offering as a whole is up to the standard of Metro productions.

"The Revolt"

Five-Reel World Version of Stage Drama. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A WELL produced, well acted picture has been made in the Peerless studios for the World program from the stage play of the same name in which Helen Ware scored a success. Barry O'Neil directed the drama which was put into scenario form by Frances Marion from the play by Edward Locke.

Technically the picture is pleasing, in photography, settings and clearness of story telling, while the sincerity of acting on the part of a well cast, skillful group of players gives appeal to the situations. Frances Nelson wins sympathy as Anna, the harrassed heroine, a shop girl of high ideals, while Clara Whipple depicts skillfully a girl of a less honorable nature. Arthur Ashley handles well the role of the leading man, who can hardly be called the "hero."

The title refers to the revolt of a wife against the double standard of morality which permits her husband to live as he wishes but holds her to the straight and narrow path. However, the story as presented shows rather the fight of a girl of good instincts against an environment of evil, for Anna's early decision to remain true to herself is as important as her later struggle.

The story is, in many of its phases, more dramatic than probable, but it is sure to hold the close attention and interest of an audience. The effects are cleverly gained, one instance being the treatment of the subtitle containing the doctor's speech, which is flashed, one word added at a time, in the most emphatic fashion.

The cast of players includes, besides those already mentioned, little Madge Evans, Miss Burneister, Frank Beamish, George McQuarrie and Ada Price.

The Story: Anna, a shop girl, is continually reproached by her stepmother because she will not join in the "good times" of her friend, Lena Schmidt. To Anna, Lena's life and her methods of getting finery are not attractive and she fights against becoming like her. Her high ideals win the admiration and love of a young salesman, Stevens, who marries her. Stevens is not careful of his own conduct, however, and when Anna's nagging stepmother breaks up the happiness of his home, he finds pleasure elsewhere. Anna, lonely and disillusioned, determines to do likewise and one evening accepts the invitation of her former chum, Lena, to a party. Lena has been treading the primrose path for some time, and her party proves to be a disagreeable one for Anna.

One of the guests becomes ill and a doctor is called. He proves to be a former admirer of Anna's, and he takes her home, where she finds her little daughter very ill. The child recovers soon, and when the doctor explains the situation to Stevens and also gives him a lecture regarding his responsibilities, we leave two characters to work out a better solution to their problems.

"Jim Grimsby's Boy"

Frank Keenan in Triangle-Ince Offering. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

LANIER BARTLETT is the author of this drama featuring Frank Keenan as a mountaineer who undergoes a conversion through meeting two people who measure up to his notion of what constitutes a worthy human. Jim Grimsby likes courageous men and women and the moment he encounters them he changes from a "bad-man" to one who is willing to respect law and females, too.

The play is commendably consistent. It starts out to develop a character and it ends by doing it, and no other line of action comes into the story in the meantime. But here impressiveness stops. The acting of Frank Keenan and the striking production given the piece by Reginald Barker are responsible for the appeal the picture holds for the screen patron.

The picture opens with a prologue. Jim Grimsby, we are told, has not a friend in Gold County, yet none dare to have him as their enemy. When the child he has decided shall be named Bill is born and he is told it is a girl Jim fairly roars his disappointment. His wife dies and Jim decides that the child will be brought up as would a boy. Sixteen years later "Bill" wants to be a girl. Jim taunts her with being typically female when she tries to steal away to go to school and in a scene with her she proves to him that she has some of the iron will he boasts all the Grimsbys had.

The new sheriff is introducing some kind of law into Gold County. He does not please Jim Grimsby and the mountaineer, to prove that Whittier will not be so brave when he has to deal with a real man, goes down into the town, holds up the gambling place and after making a list of the amount he has taken from each man leaves a note defying the sheriff to follow him into the mountains. Whittier does go after Jim and in this situation Bill again proves that she is a true Grimsby. Jim softens; he now adores his daughter and better still, he tells Whittier he can pin a deputy-sheriff's badge on him whenever the occasion arises. Bill and the sheriff marry.

Enid Markey is most conscientious in her interpretation of "Bill," but to tell the truth she seems to be mis-cast. Were this character stronger in its enactment the entire picture would be stronger. Robert McKim has a heroic role for a change and he handles it remarkably well. Fanny Midgley and J. P. Lockney are also in the cast.

The settings and the photography are excellent. The atmosphere of the mountains is here in this picture and it alone is a big attraction. "Jim Grimsby's Boy" shows Mr. Keenan, who is easily one of the best character actors who have been seen on the screen and perhaps THE best, to better advantage than "The Thoroughbred," his last release.

"Only a Rose"

Selig Two-Reel Drama Released October 16. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

A RATHER sad little story serves as the theme of this picture which Burton L. King directed. W. M. Ritchey is the author. The leading roles are taken by Robyn Adair, Virginia Kirtley, Leo Pierson, E. J. Brady, Eugenie Forde and Luella Maxam. The acting is the best feature of the production. The situations are theatrical and unreal, but effective enough to hold the attention and even stir the emotions of an uncritical audience. Leo Pierson has a heavy role and his actions are unscrupulous enough to win the dislike of the audience, while Robyn Adair and Virginia Kirtley as the cruelly treated bookkeeper and his daughter will win sympathy.

The Story. Joseph Dorn has been a bookkeeper for James Phelps, a broker, for fifteen years, receives slight consideration from his employer when his health fails. One day a doctor who had been financially injured by Phelps threatens the life of the broker. Dorn saves Phelps, but allows Louis Hunt (Pierson) to claim the credit because Hunt is engaged to marry Dorn's daughter, Alma. Hunt proves untrue to Alma and pays court to the daughter of the broker.

Later Phelps loses his position and becomes seriously ill. Alma begs help from Phelps but is refused. She is deeply touched by the gift of a rose from the daughter of the broker. The doctor who attends Dorn knows that the bookkeeper was Phelps' savior and tells the true story to the broker. Too late Phelps comes with aid. The bookkeeper is dead, and Alma, who had been grateful for a rose given in sympathy, refuses the broker's check.

On the same reel with the drama is a brief comedy, "A Boomerang" dealing with a school of detectives.

"Witchcraft"

Lasky Production of Prize-Winning Scenario Offered by Paramount. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"WITCHCRAFT," R. Ralston Reed's story which won the prize offered by the Lasky company for original photoplays written by students of the photoplay at Columbia University, is at once a good vehicle for Fannie Ward and a romantic drama of marked appeal. Though it takes some time to really get into the story—considerably more than one reel—it is a subject which suits itself to the screen's way of telling a story as only plays written for the screen ever seem to.

Margaret Turnbull scenarioized the story and only praise for her work can be spoken. If the first reel does not touch the main action she cannot be held responsible. It is far better for the scenario writer to put pictures in the beginning rather than at the end when the material must be stretched to fill out five reels. For in the beginning atmosphere can be created and so the middle and end of the film enhanced, but at the end additions can bring about only the detrimental effect of an anti-climax.

Taken as a whole "Witchcraft" is a superior offering. It is better than the average feature by a good margin. Miss Ward has the best opportunity since "The Cheat," and she gives a star performance. She is cast as the daughter of an ailing woman who is accused of witchcraft by the people in the small New England colony where they take up their residence. Suzette and her mother are Hugenot refugees and the fact that they are foreigners only adds to their unpopularity in the village.

Suzette and Richard Wayne become attached to each other but they part when he leaves for Boston to be a soldier. During his absence Suzette is forced to marry an old miser in order to save her mother from the toils of the deluded people who believe in witchcraft. It is an unhappy marriage for Suzette, and an unnecessary one. For her mother dies on the day of the wedding. Wayne returns, but on finding Suzette married he thinks it best to leave again, as his affection for her is strong. Later Suzette is accused of being a witch and she is about to be hung when Captain Wayne arrives carrying a Proclamation from the Governor putting such practices down for all time.

Frank Reicher directed the production. The direction and the production are of a high order of quality and they materially add to the appeal of the picture. The flashes of Suzette dressed as a boy on her trip through the woods to call the aid of the soldiers deserve special mention. They are beautiful and eloquently life-like scenes.

Paul Weigel is excellent as Makepeace Struble, the miser. Jack Dean in the heroic role and Lillian Leighton as the Indian woman are satisfactory. The name of the little girl who tells fancied tales of what she saw at the Indian woman's cabin to a group of children and accuses Suzette at the trial is not given in the cast, but just the same she is a remarkably fine little actress and she will attract much notice by her playing in this production. "Witchcraft," to sum up, is an admirable Lasky offering.

"The Soul of a Child"

Offered by the Pioneer Feature Film Corporation. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IN this five-reel drama the Pioneer Feature Film Corporation offers to state rights buyers a heart interest drama with Em Gorman, the capable child actress, in the leading role. "The Soul of a Child" is made up of very familiar material and it depends for appeal on the child who brings back to the right path a man who is wasting his life in the pursuit of pleasure. With those who go in strongly for sentimentality "The Soul of a Child" will win favor.

Em Gorman is a remarkable actress for her years. She has many opportunities in this play, perhaps too many. One thing is certain and that is that the director took too many close-ups of little Em. In the past, however, several pictures were "put over" by a child or some children in the cast and this offering may appeal because there is so much child in it.

The play opens in a fishermen's village. Two brothers, one married and the other greatly loved by a girl of the village, part when the single one decides to go to the city. Years later the little daughter of the brother who continued to live by the sea is robbed of her parents by a terrific storm which comes up while her father and mother are out in a small boat. The child is taken to the brother in the city by the girl who still loves him. The city man is now rich and leads a fast life. Goldenlocks falls ill and thus reunites Uncle Jim with Molly.

John Dunn appears as Jim and Wellington Playter as the father of Goldenlocks. The story was written and produced by Jack Gorman. The production is fair and the photography quite good.

"The Ragged Princess"

William Fox Drama in Five Reels. Released October 9. Reviewed by George W. Graves

WINSOME June Caprice is the star of this picture, the story for which was written by Frederic Chapin and scenarioized by John W. Kellette. Many captivating bits of business are attached to her part which she puts over with charm, and this, together with the exceptionally well offered "kid stuff" lead by little Jane Lee, constitutes the attraction of the picture, for this attraction is plainly inherent in its lighter moods, not the dramatic structure, which is quite obvious and offers for this reason only a meagre exciting power.

As the picture gets under way, we see Miss Caprice

June Caprice in "The Ragged Princess."

as one of the unfortunates who are living at an orphanage, the matron of which is as brutal with the helpless children under her charge as she is suave and gracious with the deluded officials who come to investigate conditions at the home. When Alicia can stand it no longer she runs away. Dressed as a boy she secures work at a farm at which Harry Deigan works. The latter soon discovers her secret, but keeps it to himself, the romance of the two proceeding prettily. But finally the girl's whereabouts becomes common knowledge, and, in trying to escape her pursuers she hides in the tonneau of an automobile. The car whisks her off to the city, and from here on the end is easily to be imagined.

The owner of the car, with evil designs, adopts Alicia, accedes to her every wish, and bides his time. When his time is just about ripe, Harry, fired from his job because of abetting the girl, and come to the city for work, discovers Alicia's peril and comes to the girl's rescue just as she is about to be drawn in.

Harry Hilliard is very pleasing and efficient as Harry, and Richard Neill is appropriately cast in the part of the girl's sleek captor. Florence Ashbrook is for the most part convincing as Mrs. Langford, the tyrant at the orphanage.

The comedy atmosphere in this offering is bright enough to keep one in a pleasant mood and agreeably interested, and to one who seldom sees pictures the plot may afford some excitement. In these child parts which call largely for winning personality, Miss Caprice is always fascinating. The producing of the picture was in the able hands of Director John G. Adolfi.

"The Blue Envelope Mystery"

Vitagraph Production Released by V. L. S. E. October 23. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IT IS rather refreshing to have the films present one with a story which tells of a girl who thinks she is wealthy and lives accordingly but suddenly finds that it is necessary for her to earn her own living and be equal to the task. "The Blue Envelope Mystery" is lacking in dramatic action but it pleases because it interestingly portrays the adventures of such a young woman. All comes to him who waits. We have waited to see a picture with a girl of means who can find and keep employment when necessity enters, and at last she appears.

"The Blue Envelope Mystery" is an adaptation of a story by Sophie Kerr. Doubtless, a story for Lillian Walker was sought and this one was a good selection. Miss Walker makes Leslie Brennan real and attractive and well able to sustain the interest through long spaces which lack the kind of action required by the screen. Leslie tells her experiences and in picturizing them of course there are many scenes that are of more interest to Leslie than the spectator. It's like the person who has some incident to tell you and brings in details which mean nothing at all to you, yet to him they are essential. But there is good continuity, much good acting and clear photography, so while there is no grip there are things which make up a very pleasant hour or so of entertainment in "The Blue Envelope Mystery."

Leslie is engaged to a sporty young man who drives around in a rakish motor in the beginning of the story. When he learns that she will have no more income if she marries he quickly shows that he is not a very desirable sort of person for a husband. Leslie takes a business course and secures a position as stenographer with a chemist. His new formula is sought by a crook but Leslie, who is taking it to Washington, outwits him. The end of it all is that Leslie and Ewen Kennedy, the chemist, marry.

Wilfrid North directed the production. In every respect the production is satisfactory. John D. Bennet is a convincing Ewen Kennedy and Bob Hay a good society idler as Harry Heath. Josephine Earle, Harry Northrup, Florence Radinoff, Isabelle West, Charles Kent and William Shea complete a good cast.

"Borrowed Sunshine"

Two-Act Essanay Play Released October 24. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

MARY V. McALISTER is the very much featured player in this offering. Name and actress were alike unknown to us when the opening scenes were flashed, but before the play had progressed far, we woke to the realization that the newcomer had unusual ability. Doubtless the fact that she is only six years old accounts for her previous obscurity. In so far as talent counts, she is equal to a number of better known players. Even the present absence of front teeth does not seem to handicap Miss Mary or seriously to mar her mischievous beauty.

The two-reeler is an especially pleasing presentation of a child player. The director is to be congratulated both on his training of the little girl and on his selection of scenes. Apparently he had an unusually clever as well as attractive child to direct and she should be presented frequently in coming pictures. The play will go excellently in children's programs and with audiences which like child players.

There isn't much of a story, but that makes little difference. Marguerite Clayton and Richard Travers have the only prominent grown-up roles, which offer little difficulty to actors so experienced. The settings, photography and continuity are all good. Theater patrons who crave sensational fare may perhaps be indifferent to this release, but to the writer, who had just viewed a rather mawkish problem play, the little Essanay offering was like a streak of sunshine.

The Story: Goldie and her elder sister, Helen, live in a tenement into the window of which the sunlight comes only once in the day. The little girl takes care to place a cherished flower in the sunshine every day. Her action attracts the attention of John Glenarm, a young draughtsman employed in an architect's office in a neighboring building. Later he meets the little girl in the park.

When an advertising sign is erected which shuts out even the brief period of sunlight, Goldie appeals to her new friend for aid. The young man places a mirror in the window of his office in such a way that it reflects "borrowed sunshine" onto the child's flower.

Through his kindness to Goldie, John meets Helen, with whom he falls in love. The limitation of his salary is an obstacle to their marriage, but when the winning of a prize for a model home brings John to a better position, the obstacle is overcome.

Commodore J. Stuart Blackton's American epic, "The Battle Cry of War," is fast nearing completion.

ABOUT BUDDING PLAYS, AND NEWS OF THE TRADE

These important Metro personages are, reading in the usual direction, Dave Thompson, Francis X. (you know), Beverly Bayne, Irene Howley, Harris Gordon, and Lorraine Frost, which she never is.

Apache Caveau Scene in Metro Play

Mme. Petrova Completes "The Black Butterfly" and Julius Steger Starts on New Feature. Steve Barton Joints Metro Directors.

A Parisian Caveau where the Apaches and their gigolettes drink, dine and dance is realistically depicted in "The Black Butterfly," the Metro wonderplay in which Mme. Petrova is starred. Mme. Petrova herself, with the aid of her cameraman, Andre Barlitier, stager and directed this scene at the Popular Plays and Players studio. Real Apache dancing is also a feature of the play and is given by artists of the first rank. Emile Agoust and his wife Simone de Beryl contribute a dancing duet and another gamin dance is done by Lula Paleaologus and Fred von Stange.

Julius Steger, well known in light opera and on the "legit," has begun the production of an unusual Metro wonderplay in the Rolfe studios. No name has yet been selected for the feature in which Mr. Steger stars and which is startling from the standpoint of the number of intensely dramatic situations presented. Supporting Mr. Steger appear Arline Fay, Clara Whipple, Harry Burkhardt and Stanhope Wheatcroft. David Thompson is directing the production.

Steve Barton, recently affiliated with Mack Sennett's Keystone studio, has been engaged as director by Fred J. Balshofer, general manager of the Metro-Yorke Film Corporation. Mr. Barton will start work on the Metro-Yorke picturization of Harold McGrath's "Pidgin Island," which presents Harold Lockwood and May Allison in the stellar roles.

One of the most attractive sets of the season, at the Metro-Yorke California studio, is a palatial bedroom, typical of Virginia, built especially for scenes in "Big Tremaine," the forthcoming Metro release. This spacious set is an exact duplicate of May Allison's bed-room in her Virginia home, which is known throughout the south for its unusual beauty, and surrounding estate.

In the support of Harold Lockwood and May Allison, in their latest Metro-Yorke starring vehicle, prominently appear Lester Cuneo, Lillian Hayward, Andrew Arbuckle, Virginia Southern, William De Vaull, Josephine Rice and William Ephe. Henry Otto is the director.

George D. Baker, one of the Metro-Rolfe directors, returned to the Rolfe studio yesterday from a vacation spent in Havana. Mr. Baker at once began making arrangements for a screen production of Holman F. Day's story, "Squire Flynn," with Lionel Barrymore as the star.

Having finished with "The Black Butterfly," Mme. Petrova has begun on a new Metro production, adapted from a story by Anna Steese Richardson, in which the star takes the part of a woman financier. The scenario was written by Wallace C. Clifford, and Edmund Lawrence is directing the production. Mme. Petrova is collaborating with Mrs. L. Case Russell in a new motion picture play dealing with life on the Island of Corsica. She also has finished another play which gives a striking presentation of the "unwritten law."

Charles B. Frost, motion picture editor of the Pittsburgh Dispatch, and his bride, who are on their wedding trip, visited the Metro offices and from there went to the Rolfe studio, where they met B. A. Rolfe and the various screen stars. It was Mr. Frost's first inspection of a New York motion picture studio, and he expressed admiration for the wonderful system prevailing under the management of Mr. Rolfe and Technical Director Edward Shulter.

A One Year Old Star

Little Baby Lillian Read, who has created a wide reputation for herself in the Ince spectacle, "Civilization," is not in the class of ordinary film children. She is the only child of J. Parker Read, Jr., general manager of the New York Ince organization. Mr. Read, for some time was actively engaged in helping Mr. Ince make the big spectacle on his 18,000-acre ranch overlooking Santa Monica Bay on the Pacific Coast.

Jack Read, as he is familiarly known in the business, is a picture magnate of some years practical experience. He had absolutely no idea of associating his little one with any production until the fact occurred to Mr. Ince, when he saw the child playing about one of the studios, that she might figure in his production. And so little Miss Read, aged about eighteen months, was asisgned a part in the production and rehearsed under the guidance of her father.

Strange to say, this little child was not at all calculated upon to have any great effect upon the audience. However, when the picture was first shown, the audience took to her so markedly that the child was instantly elevated to the rank of "star." Mr. Ince was so pleased that he gave Mr. Read a long time contract for the little girl. Miss Read, aged one and a half, is the youngest "star" in pictures. She is absolutely unconscious of the fame which she has achieved. It is not on record that she has even seen the picture herself, as her parents still regard her as an occupant of the nursery and take the utmost care of her.

No wonder that the entire audience sends its heart out to her for she is a tiny exponent of the greatest of all arts, that is, of being natural, unaffected and human. She personifies that "one touch of nature which makes the whole world kin."

Kohn After Productions

Marion H. Kohn has been in New York these last few days looking over the field and in quest of big productions—better than program features, with which to keep his exchanges in California busy.

Mr. Kohn is the president of the Consolidated Film Corporation of 114-16 Golden Gate avenue, San Francisco; and with a branch at Los Angeles. Quitting the business of an importer and exporter some four or five years ago, Mr. Kohn associated himself with the hustling young film man, Sol Lesser, and then became the responsible manager of the Pacific coast branch of Warner's Features. Association with P. P. Craft and the Apex, led to his buying this latter concern and finally he entered the business for himself, founding the Consolidated company, with the financial support of Los Angeles bankers.

Chicago News

J. E. O'TOOLE, manager at the Fox, Chicago office, is planning to go to New York on October 25, to attend the second annual convention of Fox managers, which is scheduled to take place on the following Saturday at the Hotel Biltmore.

George F. Bronley, Fox's Indiana "bunk dispenser" (film salesman), has started out over his territory. No offense, Georgie.

Jack O'Toole of Fox spent October 15 and 16 in Milwaukee booking his two-reel comedies which are to be released shortly after January 1, 1917.

George Berg, formerly manager of the City Hall Branch of the General Film Corporation, has affiliated himself with the Unicorn Film Corporation, Chicago office, where he will assist J. E. Willis. Both of these men are well acquainted throughout Chicago and the suburbs and are particularly anxious to meet their numerous friends at the Unicorn office in the Mallers building.

Alfred Hamburger has added another house to his already long chain. He has just taken over the Gaiety Theater, Ninety-second street and Commercial avenue, and will operate it as a high-class motion picture theater, catering to those who like and seek the best in photo plays. The house was temporarily closed for renovations and was again opened on Saturday, October 21.

J. C. Lamm, who will be remembered as having managed the Gaiety the first summer it was a picture house, has been appointed manager.

Another open meeting is announced by the Exhibitors' League of America, to take place on Friday, November 3, at 12:30 P. M in the lodge hall on the second floor of the Masonic Temple building, Randolph and State streets, Chicago. All exhibitors, whether members of the league or not, are urged to attend this meeting as a number of vitally important subjects will be brought up for discussion and an interchange of ideas.

Exchange managers will do well to attend this meeting and present their views on the various subjects which will be called to the attention of the assembled body.

If you do not want to come for any other reason, then come for the Dutch luncheon which will be served gratis.

Miss F. Rubinstein, personal representative to Sol Lesser, spent a few days in Chicago last week in the interest of Mr. Lesser's "The Ne'er Do Well."

"Bill" Sweeney, Louis Frank and Alfred Hamburger, all officials of the Illinois branch of the Exhibitors' League of America, were called to New York to attend a special meeting of the National body, the purpose of which has not been made known. The first mentioned left Chicago on October 15 and the two last on October 16.

D. Leo Dennison, who was manager of the Paramount Chicago office for a few weeks and now holds the position of personal representative to James Steele, general manager of the Famous Players Film Service, Inc., is making a tour of the Paramount offices under his jurisdiction.

On Monday, October 16, Jack Haag, manager at the Band Box Theater, where they showed "The Unborn," to women exclusively during the entire week just closing, was compelled to ask for police assistance to regulate the mob of women waiting to be admitted. They stood in a line four deep for one-half city block. This looks to be one of the best advertising "stunts" we have seen in a long while. The house will be opened to men on Sunday, October 22, and undoubtedly will be jammed to the doors. A lady orchestra as well as lady ushers were engaged and will be retained during the entire run of this picture at the Band Box.

In error we last week used the words "formerly manager of the Bartola Company, Chicago office," in speaking about Charles Pyle. The word "formerly" should have been omitted.

The following out-of-town exhibitors were visitors in Chicago during the past week:

Charles M. Walker, Gem Theater, Plymouth, Indiana.

S. L. Greenbaum, Garden Theaters of Davenport and Des Moines, Iowa.

Philip Gross, Jr., Strand Theater, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

A. F. Bretlinger, Orpheum Theater, Fort Wayne, Indiana.

Frank Cook of the Saxe Enterprises of Milwaukee, Wsiconsin.

Manager Mellenson, Princess Theater, Benton Harbor, Indiana.

E. O. Le Roche and his four-year-old son, Vialta Theater, Clifton, Illinois.

Harry Gramp, Orpheum Theater, Rockford, Illinois.

Pete Sarontis, Family Theater, Elkhart, Indiana.

George (Daddy) Hines, Auditorium Theater, South Bend, Indiana.

Charles Pacini, New Majestic Theater, Kenosha, Wisconsin.

William A. Zeeman, Majestic Theater, Coffeeville, Kansas.

Mutual Film Corporation: The expected improvement in the Mutual situation registers strongly in the last statement of the condition of the company. Figures, which indicate a very desirable increase in business and net profits, will be available within the next several days. The stock, which has been more or less dormant in the past two or three months, is now in demand, and, as good news seems to travel as fast as bad news, stockholders already seem to have learned that Mutual preferred and common are wanted in several quarters.

North American Film Corporation: The sequel to "The Diamond From the Sky" is completed and seventy-five prints are being made. This would indicate a large volume of business expected. The preferred stock, having been retired at 110, the common is now in demand, and the market has improved slightly over last week. It is stated by some of the largest stockholders that the real value of this security is considerably higher than the market quotations, which probably accounts for the stock activity shown lately.

States Film Corporation: The initial dividend of 5% per share has just been paid on the common stock. As this stock was orignially given as a bonus to the preferred, the dividends now being declared represent all profit to the stockholders.

Randolph Film Corporation: It is reported a dividend, at the rate of 7% per annum, will be declared on the preferred stock next month.

Vogue Films, Inc.: At the annual stockholders' meeting early this month, Mr. S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Co., Inc., was elected president. It is reported a dividend will shortly be paid. Vogue is now producing one two-reel comedy per week, with thirty working prints, and the increasing demand for these films would attest to their growing popularity.

Complete Record of Current Films

This record is intended to give, for the convenient use of the exhibitor in booking films, all the information about each film that it is possible to present in a space limited to one line. The classification is indicated by the letter at the left (D for drama, C for comedy, T for topical, S for scenic, E for educational, etc.) Next comes the date and the title, followed by the names of the stars in parentheses. At the extreme right hand end of the line is the distributor's booking number, preceded by the name of the producing company. The figure appearing just before this name indicates the number of reels—the italic letter S meaning a split reel.

Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

Friends—Biograph — October 23. — Featuring Mary Pickford, Henry Walthall and Lionel Barrymore. At the mining camp of Golden Creek the little orphan girl of the late proprietor of Golden Creek Inn is the pet of all the miners. She becomes greatly infatuated with Dandy Jack, who is considered by all as her sweetheart. Jack decides to leave the camp for other diggings, and the little one is almost heartbroken. As he is leaving, he meets Bob, his old chum, who has just arrived at the camp. Their greeting shows clearly the value of that little word, "friends." Later on Bob comes to the inn and falls deeply in love with the little orphan, who has realized by this time that her feeling for Jack was infatuation rather than love. Hence she and Bob are engaged to be married. Shortly before the day set for the wedding Jack returns and is twitted by the boys about the apparently fickle girl, whereupon he wagers that he can win her back, not knowing, of course, who the successful suitor is. The outcome is a revelation to all.

Out of the Shadows—(Two Reels)—Selig—October 23.—Featuring Robyn Adair and Virginia Kirtley. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

Trouble for Four—Vitagraph—October 23.—Florence Walters, a newlywed, raves about her ideal husband to the Widow Hartley and the widow tells her that all men are true, until you find them out. Florence is indignant and the widow suggests putting Harry to the test. The widow writes a note to Harry asking him to dine with her that evening at the Hotel Norman. Harry meets a bachelor friend on the way to the hotel and Bobby begs to keep the appointment. The widow, having never seen Harry, thinks that Bobby is he and after dining with him she makes her getaway, leaving Bobby to foot the bills. He discovers that he left his money in his other suit and calls up Harry to get him out of the trouble. The widow tells Florence that she dined with her husband and Florence leaves and returns to her mother's. Bobby calls on the widow and makes violent love to her and she tells him he ought to be ashamed of himself, has he no consideration for the little woman in the next room. Just at this moment Harry appears on the scene and Florence also returns with her mother. Finally everything is straightened out and all ends happily.

The Battle of Elderbrush Gulch—(Two Reels)—Biograph Reissue—October 24.—Featuring Mae Marsh. Two orphan children from over the mountain are sent to their uncle in Elderbrush, a new settlement just being formed close to a hostile Indian tribe. The elder of the two girls insists on keeping her puppies and her uncle forbids her to bring them into the house. She leaves the puppies outside and later in the evening, thinking the puppies will be cold, she goes out for them and sees them in the distance running through the elderbrush. They are also seen by two Indians, the chief's son and his friend. They catch the dogs just as the little girl appears, and her uncle, who has followed her, sees her struggling to gain possession of them. He shoots the chief's son and the next day the Indians go on the warpath and completely devastate the center of the settlement. Then then proceed to the rancher's cabin, where the girl with her little sister and puppies are hiding in a big chest. Help arrives before the Indians have time to reach the cabin, however, and all ends happily.

Borrowed Sunshine—(Two Reels)—Essanay—October 24.—Featuring Richard C. Travers and Marguerite Clayton. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

The Fable of the Throbbing Genius of a Tank Town Who Was Encouraged by Her Folks Who Were Prominent—Essanay—October 25.—Lila, daughter of the egg and poultry king, scored a knockout in a war drama held as a charity benefit. Friends advised her to go in the movies. Thereafter, when Lila moved from one room to another the portieres had to be spread the entire length of the pole, so as to make room for her head. A local haberdasher, who was plotting to surround her with a new bungalow and a lot of mission furniture, went to call as per usual, and found her too busy to hold hands. Father saw he was hooked, so he took her to a moving picture school to have her searched for talent. It took many an egg to have her properly conservatoried. Lila took her diploma the rounds of the studios and found that artist temperaments were more abundant than lamp posts. She finally got on as the Maid who enters with her back to the camera in the early part of act two. When Lila saw the first run and found her scene had been cut out, she caught the first train for the home town. The next day she had a strip of red carpet spread for the haberdasher and was learning to cook on a fireless heater. Moral—The true friend to home talent is one who goes to the benefit and hisses all the evening.

Betty's Affair—Vitagraph—October 27.—Betty loves Bob, who has every delightful qualification, except money. Therefore, her stern father objects to the match and plans to wed his darling to a nondescript by the name of Ferdinand who has only one point of attraction, namely, the prospect that he will inherit a wad when his healthy uncle passes in his checks, same time in the dim, distant future. Ferdinand comes to the home of Betty to claim his bride, whereat the cook, who belongs to the Stew Experts' Union, quits rather than cook for "company." Bob, disguised as a member of the female species, takes the cook's place in the kitchen and maltreats the food to such an extent that flirty Ferddie longs for home and mother. Meanwhile, of course, Betty and Bob put one over on the visitor by being married on the sly and when finally foolish father insists upon the crime of marrying his offspring to the distant legacy, he finds that he has been famously foiled by the lovely lovers.

It Never Could Happen—(Three Reels)—Essanay—October 28.—Featuring Richard C. Travers and Frances Benedict featured. Incensed at Robert Prandor's escapades, his father tells him to leave home and return only when he has earned $100. This will move the elder man to make him a partner. The boy is soon forced by necessity to take a place as waiter. Here he catches the eye of Wyman, who hires him as butler. Thyra, his daughter, is the chilliest thing Prandor ever met. When she decides to marry him he gets frightened and tries to escape, but tumbles down a stair and is severely injured. Prandor immediately falls in love with Elsie Forbes, his nurse. Thyra is using her supposed engagement to Prandor as a cloak to cover her real affection for another man, opposed by her father. An entanglement of forged checks worries Wyman and his secretary arrests young Prandor. Elsie Forbes is arrested also. While Prandor is making the secretary himself confess to the forgeries, his father, long a friend of Wyman, enters and the situation is happily solved, the final obstacle being removed when word comes that Thyra has eloped with the other man.

Professor Jeremy's Experiment—(Two Reels)—American—October 23.—Featuring Orral Humphrey. Prof. Jeremy, an eccentric old scientist, compounds a liquid which, if sprinkled on a person's face, will cause that person to speak the truth—and nothing but the truth. He first experiments on the cook, whose sweetheart, the policeman, hears her tell the professor that she gives him the professor's whiskey and cigars. Then the professor's daughter and her lover, Thorpe Willis, a young newspaper man, appear upon the scene, and Thorpe accidentally getting a spray of the liquid on his face, begins to lay bare his soul. The professor kicks Thorpe out and the next morning reads an account in the paper of his discovery. "Smoothy" Smithers, a crook, also reads the notice. The professor is finally so pestered by requests for the formula that he destroys it and locks the liquid in the safe. Smithers manages to get the liquid from the safe, but drops the bottle, allowing some of the liquid to spatter in his face. He then emerges from the house declaring to the world that he has just burglarized a house. The professor is finally so harassed by requests that he turns to Thorpe for help. The reporter writes up the whole affair as a hoax on the public and then is accepted as Jeremy's son-in-law.

The Folly of Fear—(Two Reels)—Mutual)—October 24.—Featuring Edwin August and Ruth Blair. La Rue, an author, is in love with Grace Ellis, who refuses to marry him. Ethel Rutledge, La Rue's secretary, has an unfortunate affair with Gerard Weir, but discovers in time that he is an adventurer. Later La Rue discovers the deception and asks an explanation of Ethel, but through fear of Weir she will not explain. Through an odd chain of circumstances Grace Ellis discovers what the document is that Weir is holding over Ethel's head and tells La Rue of it. Years before Ethel had been tricked into a mock marriage with Weir, but had discovered it in time. Weir had doctored a hotel register to make it look as though she had been his wife and this was the document he was holding over her. Weir is killed and Ethel is once more folded in her husband's arms.

Both meet their doom over a cliff, another instance of the reward of trickery.

The Narrow Creed—(Two Reels)—Big U—October 26.—The girl's betrayer in this picture proves to be the deacon's son. The latter, harrassed by his conscience, decides to look up Ruth, marry her, and save her from the disgrace which her fatherless child has brought. Association Adopts "Advisory Plan"

ADVISORY EXECUTIVE COMMITTEES AUTHORIZED IN ALL FILM CENTERS

THAT the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry would accomplish great things was well understood from its organization and those high ideals have not been shattered in any way, in fact have been strengthened by the work already done by this body. Since its inception it has worked at high speed with the most gratifying results in its upbuilding.

The latest undertaking of the association is to start the operation of a country-wide advisory executive committee. It has been estimated that there are nearly a million persons directly employed in and affiliated with the motion picture industry and the aim of the national body is to make this active million into an intensified active unit. The Association, from a preliminary survey, has realized the magnitude of the project and the first step to link up separate localities with the central body was taken at the last meeting of the Executive Committee, when Walter W. Irwin, of the Greater Vitagraph, V. L. S. E., Inc., presided. It was then the "advisory plan" was adopted by which the entire industry will be so functioned that even the most remote sections of it will get as prompt action on vital questions as though they were really in New York. And, as a matter of fact, they will be in New York by direct representation as the Executive Committee authorized the formation of Advisory Executive Committees in all large motion picture centers.

Executive Secretary Frederick H. Elliott, one of the most expert organizers in the country, fully outlined the plan. These advisory bodies will be complete organizations in themselves, with the same rules and classifications of memberships as the parent body. They will pass upon all questions that may be submitted, and then send their recommendations to the Executive Committee and the Board of Directors of the National Association prior to all scheduled meetings.

Judge A. P. Tugwell, of Los Angeles, one of the national directors, who came all the way from the coast to report conditions and to give advice and directions concerning the organization there, wired to his associates in California and by the time he returns all of the preparations for the formation of the branch, practically will have been completed. The Advisory Executive Committee of California will be the first of a quickly following series. Illinois will be the next, with the headquarters in Chicago. William A. Brady, president of the National Association, and Walter W. Irwin, at a recent conference offered the chairmanship of this body to John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual. He asked to reserve his decision until he had given the matter his fullest consideration. The Illinois committee would number among its members George K. Spoor, of the Essanay; W. N. Selig, of the Selig Polyscope; Frederick J. Ireland of the Emerald Motion Picture Corporation; Donald J. Bell, of Bell & Howell; Alfred Hamburger, and others well known in the industry.

The advisory committees are to be representative of each of the five classes composing the directorate of the Association. No specification of the number from each class was made and these matters are to be settled wholly by the locals. There are more than fifty membership classifications, even including railroads and insurance companies, and, in fact, every interest and individual that does business with the industry.

Among the well known figures in California who are members of the National Association are David Wark Griffith, Thomas H. Ince, and Mack Sennett.

"In the west we few poor, down-trodden producers have gotten together and fought in San Francisco and in Los Angeles very weakly and very childishly," says Mr. Griffith. "We have defeated everything in the censorship line in that part of the country. San Francisco and several of the cities, do not owe anything to the motion picture industry, so it was a pure up-fight and they voted against it—12 to 3—against any form of censorship."

Already has the Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco done much practical work toward the elimination of official censorship. It now acts as censor, with the entirely friendly approval of the local government and thus far has won the approval of even those who looked upon the change with misgivings and suspicion. It even proceeded against any exhibitor who was featuring a vice film, after having the police cart away what was considered an offensive lobby display.

Scope of Committee on Legislation

The subject of legislation affecting the motion picture is one of the biggest movements just now with the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry.

Mr. Seabury, who is chairman of the Committee on Legislation, is a high authority on the laws of the various states and the task that he and his co-workers, inside and out of the National Association, have set themselves to do appeals to the imagination in its broad, constructive purpose. The Legislative Committee is planned to be relatively big and as powerful as the association of which it is a part. It will cover every state, city, town and hamlet in the United States. It will be a vast, specialized intelligence department. It will be a legal division that draws upon the best talent in legislative and in general law. It embodies a big national idea, too, which appeals to the spirit of thousands of serious-minded persons who see in the motion picture an aid to every good and patriotic purpose.

With Mr. William M. Seabury, at its head, this important body is composed of Alfred Hamburger, theatrical manager of Chicago; Richard A. Rowland, Metro Pictures Corporation, New York; Peter Jeup, Detroit; Ernest Horstmann, Boston; James B. Clark, A. P. Tugwell, Los Angeles; Paul Cromelin, Cosmofotofilm, New York; Walter W. Irwin, Greater Vitagraph, V. L. S. E., Inc.; Louis Levine, Regent Theater, Brooklyn; Lee Ochs, National President of the Exhibitors' League of America; P. A. Powers, Universal Film Mfg. Co., New York; Hiram Abrams, Paramount Pictures Corporation; Maurice Choynski, Newberry Theater, Chicago; Charles Phillips, Milwaukee; W. Stephen Bush, New York; Nicholas Power, Nicholas Power Co., New York.

"I regard the committee as perhaps the most important committee of the association," says Mr. Seabury, "and it is comprised, in part, of members of the association, and in part, of advisory members of the committee, who are not members of the association, but who in some instances are lawyers representing the important film interests, and in other instances prominent club women and others interested in social and public welfare work."

The lawyers who have consented to act in an advisory capacity include the best talent that has been turned to the service of the great film corporations: Gebriel Hess, Albert H. T. Banzhaf, Nathan Vidaver, Samuel Field, James Cowden Meyers, Walter N. Seligsberg, Bainbridge Colby, J. Robert Rubin, Arthur S. Friend, Siegfried Hartman and Arthur Butler Graham.

Among the women who will work with the intelligence of the guidance of fruitful experience are Mrs. Mary Norton, of Minneapolis, chairman of the Special Committee on Motion Pictures of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and Mrs. Florence Colpitts, and Mrs. Gretrude Springer, of New York, both members of the Review Committee of the National Board.

"Among the objects and purposes of the legislative committee of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry," says Mr. Seabury in summing up, "is the effort which the committee will make to oppose the enactment of legislation harmful to the industry, and to discuss and formulate legislation which may tend to benefit the industry."

Presidential Candidates on Censorship

President Wilson is to prepare an expression on censorship, a crystallization of his recent informal talk at Shadow Lawn with the representatives of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry, which the association will have exhibited along with the photographs taken on the occasion, in the 20,000 motion picture houses in the country. Mr. Hughes has already performed this service for the industry, representatives of which he addressed recently at the Essex County Country Club, West Orange, N. J.

At the last meeting of the Executive Committee, Walter W. Irwin, chairman, presented the request of Bainbridge Colby, former New Jersey state senator and a member of the Republican National Committee, requesting an endorsement of Mr. Hughes' attitude toward the Motion Picture Industry. The committee therefore approved the following screen captions:

CHARLES EVANS HUGHES ON CENSORSHIP.

"Motion pictures are destined to play a marvelous part in our education."

Thoroughly believes in protecting public morals by proper regulations through the exercise of the police power.

"I am not inclined to favor censorship of motion pictures as—

"History proves that censorship leads to arbitrary action."

These expressions are approved and indorsed by the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry and by the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Executive Secretary Frederick H. Elliot was instructed to communicate with the Democratic National Committee and the President's secretary, Mr. Tumulty, enclosing a copy of the Hughes statement, with the endorsement of the association and its affiliation, the Exhibitors' League of America, inviting them to prepare similar expression for the president and submit it for approval, with assurances of immediate action. President Wilson and Mr. Hughes meet on common ground in discussing motion picture censorship, for they have expressed virtually the same view—that they are against the principle of it as a federal measure; that such a law could not apply to a local condition.

Chairman Irwin recommended that the meetings with both candidates be shown throughout the country and that both statements be given out between now and election day. That 200 prints should be secured of the combined films and that the secretary be instructed to communicate with J. E. Brulatour and George Eastman in an effort to get a donation of about 80,000 feet of film and then have some firm make the prints gratuitously for the benefit of the industry in its censorship campaign.

Selig to Produce in Chicago

Al Green, the youthful director, has been summoned from the Selig studios at Los Angeles to Chicago by William N. Selig. According to present plans Mr. Green will probably produce one or more five-reel feature plays and some of the elaborate interiors may be filmed at the Chicago studios. Mr. Green will be furnished with an exceptional cast of players. For years Green was assistant director to Colin Campbell. Later Mr. Green was promoted by Mr. Selig to a full-fledged directorship. He is not only a capable actor but has original methods of production. He has been with the Selig Company for over five years, and accompanied "The Ne'er-Do-Well" players to the Panama Canal zone where scenes for that production were filmed. Mr. Green also plays a part in "The Crisis," and was assistant to Mr. Campbell when "The Crisis" was produced.

Director Jacques Jaccard and his big company of players are working on the eleventh episode of the big Universal serial, "Liberty."

Trinz, manager Covent Garden Theater.—Neighborhood theater, catering to the better classes.

"The Ragged Princess (Fox), featuring June Caprice—for some reasons this star is not very popular. However, the people enjoyed this picture immensely. The mainstay of the picture being the popular and clever child actress, Jane Lee, who with her perfectly natural and unposed acting and capers, furnished a number of hearty laughs. The story, old stuff; photography, even."—George Moore, manager Orpheum Theater. Downtown house.

"Old Folks at Home (Triangle), featuring Sir Herbert Tree. All in all a very good picture which may meet with some objection, due to an unjust murder and a later decision of 'not guilty' by a jury which is influenced by the tears and pleadings of the accused's mother. A sub-title inserted into this picture endeavors to justify the murder and my patrons seemed to be satisfied."—S. Trinz, manager Covent Garden Theater.—Neighborhood theater, catering to the better classes.

An Ideal Children's Matinee

THE IMPRESSIONS OF NED HOLMES, MANAGER, STUDEBAKER THEATER, CHICAGO

By B. F. Barrett

"GEE! He punched him in the beezer!" "Watch him biff him in the snout!" Then followed shouts of laughter. No, it wasn't a street fight. It was a big downtown theater in which was being held a special matinee for the children. These expressions may not mirror just exactly the idea of the education which mothers desire their little ones to absorb from a children's matinee in a motion picture theater, but the exclamations were so evidently from the soul outward and were so expressive of unalloyed pleasure and utter disregard of all training and English, in the pure joy of the picture that even the most horrified parents could not but smile.

And it was just because he appreciated how the children would glory in the odd and unusual scenes in the picture that Ned Holmes, manager of the Studebaker Theater, Chicago, arranged to have a breakfast matinee every Saturday morning of "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea." The exclamations quoted broke forth during the scene of the hunt on the bottom of the sea when Captain Nemo struck the shark with his gun.

"I just had to have a special performance for the children," said Mr. Holmes. "I could not accommodate them at the regular matinee and evening performances, and you feel like an ogre when the children come in with their faces beaming with anticipation and see their hearts broken with disappointment when told there are no more seats for the evening. I suppose they also had a folorn feeling that although their parents brought them down this afternoon it might be some time before they could come again.

"And then there are the children coming alone to be taken care of. I can not allow youngsters of from ten to fourteen to attend an entertainment alone in the evening. And even though the theater is down town there have been a good many boys who came alone, and in two or three cases I am pretty sure that they ran away to come, and I had visions of fond mothers hunting wildly for these same children if I allowed them to attend the performance and arrive home about eleven o'clock at night. There was one boy, apparently fourteen, who came in the other evening, and with him were two others, one about ten and the other a little fellow not more than six. They acted pretty tired and I had an idea they walked all the way down town because they had just enough money to get in and couldn't spare the price for carfare. And then I had to refuse them admittance. It was a terrible blow.

"Of course there are the afternoon performances each day, but the children are in school then, and Saturday afternoon the crowd has been more than we could manage. We have been charging regular theater prices for our evening performances and I felt that this was debarring many children from seeing the show. The parents would hesitate quite a while before they would bring four or five youngsters down when the price was seventy-five cents or a dollar apiece. And I like the kiddies, you know. I have something here which they enjoy to the top notch and I wanted to give them a chance to see it. So one Saturday afternoon when the lobby was packed and the announcement was made that there were no more seats for that performance, the little happy faces became grave and it was just impossible to keep the tears back in many cases, I felt that something must be done, so I told the children that I would hereafter have a breakfast matinee every Saturday morning at ten-thirty and the admission would only be twenty-five and fifty cents. My! You would have thought I was a fairy god-mother or the prince who had just rescued the beautiful maiden from the giant. I never had so many admiring glances cast at me in my life as I received from those little folks when they were told that I would have a special performance for their benefit.

"And these Saturday morning performances are more fun than any other show I give. The children are so enthusiastic and their sense of humor is so keen that they get a great deal more out of the picture than the older people do. They laugh and laugh over some subtle bit of comedy which the adults do not even get, and probably the director himself never realized was there.

"The people who claim that children do not care for adaptations of books are greatly mistaken. Most of the children have read '20,000 Leagues Under the Sea' and the picture was like meeting an old and well-loved friend. They are so pleased when a character whom they have especially admired comes on the screen. How good it is to see him. They are constantly watching for scenes which especially appealed to them in the book, and when they come you can hear all over the house, 'Oh, here it is!' 'Don't you remember?' 'Yes, that is just what the book said.'

"I will admit that '20,000 Leagues Under the Sea' is different from many other adaptations. It is one of the wonder books of the child and the picture is even a greater miracle. It is better than a circus. There is something doing every minute and all the 'stunts' are unusual and out of the ordinary. How the children clap when the picture of Jules Verne appears on the screen. Here is the man who gave them this wonderful story. Here is the man whose imagination could soar even farther than theirs. He knew the kind of stories a boy wanted. None of these 'kissing, loving things,' but real adventures.

"The film is eight reels long, but the children do not tire. I believe they would sit through eight more. They are so excited and thrilled I do not believe they have breath enough left to wiggle. And at the same time they are being educated. We don't advertise this as an educational film, however, on the general principle that the children will believe that what is good for them they don't want to see. But they are gaining a liberal education while watching the film. The unusual deep sea pictures and the submarine views in this picture are invaluable to the child. If I had a whole raft of children myself I certainly would want them to see it.

"It is very amusing to hear the comments of the children and the comparison they make, and many of their remarks show how they are being educated while amused. When the men in their diving suits first began to walk along the bottom of the ocean one boy exclaimed, 'Gee, who does he think he is, Vernon Castle getting ready to dance? Why don't he stand up straight and walk along? Suppose he thinks that's some new dance step!' But his disgust was turned to interest when the subtitle told him to watch how the men had to fight the strong undertow. Here was something he did not know before.

"I had a great argument with one boy about the guns that were used on the bottom of the ocean. He said I knew just as well as he did that guns wouldn't go off under water and that was just a fake. They couldn't really kill anything with those guns. I tried to explain to him, and some of the older boys standing around tried to tell him that the subtitle made that clear, but he was still doubtful. That was a new idea that he must study over and ask his daddy about."

Here is a lesson to the people who claim that the children want only fairy stories and comedies and try to plan a program which will "reach down" to them. What they want is thrills. As one little girl expressed it: "I like the pictures where your breath won't come." They like to see something which down in their hearts they feel is a little beyond them. They admire some one who knows more than they do. They like to feel that they are learning something out of the ordinary which they can spring on the other "kids." Although the very name "educational film" too often antagonizes them.

Mr. Holmes' Saturday morning performance may well be classed as an ideal children's entertainment from all standpoints. Fifteen minutes before the show began the lobby was filled with children accompanied by their parents. The line extended to the door and it was a restless, expectant crowd. Of course there is always more glamour to a child in being taken downtown to a theater, because the business district is a novelty and a wonder to them anyway. The fact that the theater is situated downtown means that the mothers or some older person must accompany them, and the one situation which the neighborhood manager has to contend with all the time is easily solved. The children can't be sent alone to take care of themselves or be taken care of by the manager.

Most of the children were from eight to fourteen or sixteen and a better behaved, more enthralled—and incidentally more interesting—audience never filled a theater. They absorbed all the information unconsciously. They laughed at all the little quirks which even the director probably never imagined would bring a smile. They held their breath in the thrilling scenes until you were afraid they would get black in the face. But they came out alive, and they came out educated, and they came out wishing there was more to see, although they had sat through eight reels of a picture with only five minutes intermission in which they could wiggle and move about.

I really pitied the parents. The questions they were asked and the questions they will have to answer after they reach home to satisfy all the new wonderings that arise, and the seeking after information that was suggested and perhaps not exactly understood. There was so much that one small mind could not grasp it all at once and some things there was not time to digest thoroughly, so these will have to be explained at home. This shows what films will do which are a little above the children, and yet of which they can grasp a great deal. They make the child anxious to acquire knowledge. They send him to books and encyclopedias to study. They give him food for thought—and incidentally a fund of questions to be asked—which he will get in no other place. Even reading the book is not as good as seeing the play, for the picture makes everything so real.

If any exhibitor doubts that there is a place for the special performance for children, that it will be appreciated, and that it can be made to give the children just what they want, realize the parents' ideal, and satisfy the exhibitor, let him visit the Studebaker theater on Saturday morning. Here he will find all conditions ideal for a performance of this kind and here he can learn how to conduct such entertainments, how to get the children to come, and what to offer them to keep them coming.

Chicago Houses Score With Feature

During the first two weeks of October, "The Common Law," featuring Clara Kimball Young, kept the Studebaker Theater on exclusive Michigan avenue filled to brimming, and this is a news, not a press agent story. The first night that this exceptional Selznick feature was run it was necessary to call for an extra force of policemen to control the crowds that packed the lobby and clogged the entrance. The Studebaker seats 1,400 people —at one time.

Following the run at the above house, Jones, Linick & Schaefer placed the Young feature in the Bijou Dream on State street for three weeks, the first week as an exclusive run. This house seats 340 and runs ten shows a day. At seven of the shows on practically every day patrons are held out. The first week fifteen and twenty cents was charged; ten and fifteen cents are the present prices—ten cents up to noon and fifteen until the house closes. "We have few complaints concerning any picture," said Assistant Manager Gotshall, "but there has been absolutely no complaint about 'The Common Law' during all the time we have run it."

The Covent Garden Theater, a Lubliner & Trinz house, which seats over 2,000, ran the Selznick feature for two days last week and plays a return engagement with it next week. At the President Theater, on the South Side of Chicago, the doors were pushed off their hinges by the pressure of the crowds eager to renew their acquaintance with Clara Kimball Young and Robert W. Chambers, the author of the popular story.

Several other outlying houses are now running the feature.

Fire Threatens Metro Studio

Two and a half reels of Mabel Taliaferro's new six-reel feature, "The Sun-beam," which had just been completed, and a number of costly costumes were damaged in a fire which broke out in the film-developing room of the Rolfe-Metro Studio, at 3 West Sixty-first street. That no greater damage was done was due to the prompt action of the actors and actresses who were rehearsing on the floor above. They came quickly to the rescue and the flames were soon under control, and what might have proved a disastrous fire was virtually extinguished before the fire department arrived.

Billie Burke Plays "Mother"

Billie Burke has begun her much-heralded new role.

On October 23 there was born to Mr. and Mrs. Florenz Ziegfeld, Jr., of New York, a daughter. Billie is said to be in the best of health and is delighted with the role of "Mother." The miniature of the glowing-haired Billie is growing very normally and is already assured a place in the 1930 "Follies."

Mr. and Mrs. Ziegfeld and daughter are living at the Ansonia Hotel.

Candidates Censor Censorship

PROSPECTIVE ILLINOIS OFFICIALS EXPRESS VIEWS, ETC.

LAST week this magazine printed the letters written by a number of candidates for state offices in Illinois in response to a request by MOTOGRAPHY that they make public their views on the question of censorship. The burden of the song sung in those letters was: "The people are the pictures' best censors."

The ideas expressed in the communications which follow continue in the same key.

Astoria, Ill., October, 17, 1916.

I think that the state has too many boards now for the benefit of the general public, and the man that runs a vulgar picture show would soon be put out of business by the general public.
—William H. Basel, Democratic candidate for Representative, Forty-third District.

Chicago, October 17, 1916.

I have not investigated the subject of regulations of moving pictures by the state as I am not a representative in the State Legislature and, therefore, the matter would not come before me.
—George Edmund Foss, Republican candidate for Congress, Tenth Congressional District.

Public Would Eliminate Undesirable Pictures

Chicago, October 18, 1916.

I wish to say that I firmly believe that the general public is capable of being its own censor. The judgment of the public is usually in the right and public censorship would soon eliminate undesirable pictures.
—Meyer Cossman, Republican candidate for State Senator, Second District.

Chicago, October 22, 1916.

I am not in favor of a state board of censorship over moving pictures. I believe the public are the best censors in the world in such matters and they should be the judges also.
—Frank J. Ryan, Democratic candidate for State Representative, Eleventh District.

Pontiac, Ill., October 18, 1916.

Your favor, dated October 16th, received and noted.

I do not believe that a state board of censorship is necessary. In my six years' experience as mayor, in handling shows and motion pictures, by applying business principles, we had no friction or trouble. I think if the control is left with the city officials it would be more satisfactory to the public. The general public in a city the size of Pontiac would be censorship enough as they could not have a successful picture show unless they gave the people what they wanted.
—S. A. Rathbun, Democratic candidate for Representative, Seventeenth District, Illinois.

Chicago, October 20, 1916.

I stand against the censorship of moving pictures by either the city or state.

I firmly believe that the people are intelligent enough to show by their patronage what moving picture or pictures should or should not be shown.
—John M. Powell, Democratic candidate for State Senator, Second Senatorial District.

Chicago, Ill., October 19, 1916.

Replying to your esteemed favor of October 13, I wish to say from my point of view, motion pictures, when given publicity on the screen are identically in the same position as newspapers giving publicity to words, and motion pictures, according to my notion, should be placed on no more nor no less restraint than newspapers or publications of any other kind. I have not had time to look into the subject matter as presented by you, as I am in the midst of a campaign, but wish to refer you to my record as a senator of this state and I think you will come to the conclusion that I ought to be classed with the liberal and broad-gauged people of the State.
—Niels Juul, Republican candidate for Congress, Seventh Congressional District.

Kilbourne, Ill., October, 19, 1916.

Mr. Saylor wishes me to say that he is heartily in sympathy with the motion picture interests and that in case of his election, no action will be taken by him that will prove detrimental to their interests. In other words, Mr. Saylor believes the showing of motion pictures should be left to the general public to decide and that will be sufficient censorship for those films which should not be shown. The motion picture interests will make no mistake in supporting Mr. Saylor and will find him a warm friend favorable to their cause.
—F. L. Draper, for Walter B. Saylor, Republican candidate for Congress.

"Unequivocally Opposed to Censorship"

Chicago, Ill., October 17, 1916.

Relative to my attitude on the question of regulation of motion pictures, beg to state that I am unequivocally opposed to censorship, as I believe the public itself can either make or break a proposition of this kind by its support or failure to support the same; and I think the public itself is the proper censor of motion pictures. If there is any way in which I might be of service, if successful in this election, you may call on me.
—Eugene L. McGarry, Democratic candidate for Congressman, Ninth Congressional District.

Quincy, Ill., October 20, 1916.

I am in receipt of your letter of recent date asking for my position on the regulation of motion pictures. In reply will state that I fully realize the impossibility of constituting a board with power to censor pictures in a practical manner. The police power of a municipality is broad enough to prohibit any picture of an immoral nature, or a picture that in any manner might incite the public to cause a riot, etc. We had a board of censors in this city, but their censorship has never been satisfactory, and several of the members of the board have resigned, so at the present time the board is not active in any manner. It is also my opinion that the lack of support from the public for films of an objectionable character is such that no producing company would find it profitable to finance them.
—Edward P. Allen, Democratic candidate for Congress, Fifteenth Congressional District.

Chicago, Ill., October 20, 1916.

The matter of having boards of censors to pass on motion pictures is abused in many cases, as appears to me. There are more of these boards than are necessary and perhaps it is done for the purpose of creating places or positions as much as for any other reason. In fact, it would seem that the public by withdrawing its support would be all the censorship that would be needed. They have no board of censors to regulate the theaters and other places of amusement and I have never been able to understand why the exception was made as to the motion pictures. The system of having a board of censors has not been a success. Many pictures were barred which should have been shown and some get by which are so bad that the public itself is condemnation enough to make them unpopular and unsuccessful.
—A. W. Fulton, Republican candidate for Congress, Sixth Congressional District.

Theaters Rebooking Paramounts

The announcement that Marguerite Clark and Pauline Frederick, two of the most popular photoplay stars on the screen, have renewed their contracts with the Famous Players Film Company and will continue to appear on the Paramount Program, has concentrated the attention of the motion picture fans upon these two stars to such an extent that all of Paramount's exchanges have been flooded with requests for re-bookings on these subjects.

The news of their determination to remain on the screen and not accept tempting offers to return to the stage has, through the publicity departments of Famous Players and Paramount, traveled with great rapidity from coast to coast and interest in these two great actresses is at fever heat. It is natural, therefore, that the logical time for re-booking these subjects is at hand.

Some Paramount theaters are distributing ballots to their audiences, on which are printed all the productions that Miss Clark and Miss Frederick have appeared in, announcing to their patrons that they will re-book as many of these pictures as their patrons demand.

PLAYERS' CLUB FOR WEST

Los Angeles Is Planning a Club of Photoplay Artists and Others Which Will Rival Those of Paris and East

A players' club which will rival the Lambs and Friars of New York, was planned at a recent meeting held in Hollywood which was attended by about two hundred photoplay artists and representative citizens of Los Angeles. The plans were not definitely outlined but will probably materialize in a few weeks. The aim of the organization is to popularize the silent drama and fraternize its units of artists.

The club will draw its membership from Southern California's three thousand or more motion picture players, exclusive of the vast army of "extras" and others around the studios. These will form the active membership which will control the organization. The associate membership will be selected from the business men of the city, artists of other lines and celebrities.

At the initial meeting Hollywood was represented by the following men: O. C. Craig, George Cooke, C. E. Toberman, C. G. Greenwood and George Eastman, all prominent in the business and civic life of that community. It was these men who were responsible for the new nationally celebrated open-air production of "Julius Caesar" a few months ago.

The following committee was appointed by James Young, who presided, to formulate by-laws for the club and attend to other details of organization: William Farnum, Neal Burns, Crane Wilbur, Sid Chaplin, George Eastman, Bertram Bracken, Edward Brady, Hal Cooley, Clark Irvine, C. C. Craig, Jack Sacker, Norman Manning, J. A. Allen, Wallace Reid, Jack Holt, Arthur Shirley and Guy Price. The committee will meet the latter part of the week, at which time the organization will be further cemented.

Among others who attended the birth of the Players were Harry Caulfield, Fred Kley, Peggy Hagen, Mae Murray, W. E. Keefe, Eddie Dillon, Carter

De Mille Made President of Morosco

The first official change resulting from the recent combination of the Famous Players, Lasky Corporation, Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company, and Pallas Pictures, is the election of Cecil B. De Mille, director general of the Lasky studios, to the presidency of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company and the vice-presidency of Pallas Pictures.

Mr. De Mille was one of the organizers of the Lasky Company and has been director general at their studios in Hollywood since its inception. He will still retain supervision of Lasky's producing activities. Frank A. Garbutt of the Morosco-Pallas Company, becomes general executive manager of all west coast studios of the Famous-Lasky-Morosco-Pallas Companies.

Ralph Ince Leaves Vitagraph?

A rumor which has just percolated west from New York states that Ralph Ince, for many years a Vitagraph actor and director, has resigned from that company to go into producing on his own account. It is said that Lucille Lee Stewart, sister of Anita, and Huntley Gordon are already assured as Mr. Ince's stars in his first releases. It is expected that Mr. Ince will work in the old Vitagraph studio at Bay Shore, Long Island. He was with Vitagraph nine years.

Screenshine

By Mel Ody

TWO weeks ago we told you the story of the boys down in a little Illinois house who made a sieve of the screen shooting the Indians in the picture with air guns.

But, following its custom of tagging yesterday ancient history, the film industry has now made that story passé.

Over in Hammond, Indiana, last week John Sebastain pulled out a six-cylinder shooter and blew two holes through the screen to kill the villain.

John had come over from South Chicago to have a good time. He had it, and in the having his sense of chivalry was roused to a high pitch.

So John, in attempting to do the heroine a good turn landed in a cold iron cage.

Small wonder then that knighthood is not still in flower.

Manager O'Toole of the Chicago Fox office was a big league umpire for eight years. No wonder he books so many home runs, and don't care a cuss what you call him.

SURE, US!

"Goodness, is there anybody who hasn't kissed me?" exclaimed Marguerite Courtot the other day after she had spent a day, more or less, rehearsing a play full of good old-fashioned smacks. Speak up, exhibs.

Mary Charleson and Tom North of Seattle are in Chicago. Their proximity in this paragraph doesn't signify anything.

Along with all the other things, legs have gone up.

If you had very beautiful legs would you insure them for $20,000? That's what Zitelka Dolores, one of the new beauties of Ziegfeld's chorus, has done. Florenz says they're the most perfect limbs in the world, and he comes as near knowing as anybody. Along with the high cost of everything else it is now getting expensive to have beautiful legs.

But then, legs have been going up in musical comedy and burlesque for a long time. That's why the red plush on the front rows is always squshed flat.

Stude: "Ever read Maeterlinck's 'Bluebird'?"

Fan: "No, but I've seen lots of his Bluebirds on the screen."

SOME DREAMS WOULDN'T PASS.

She was an exhibitor's only child.

He allowed her to watch the slipping celluloids to her heart's content.

One day, so she herself told us, she saw so many pictures that she slept a troubled sleep at night and every dream wound up with "Passed by the National Board of Reviews."

Cupid is shooting the Chicago Pathe office all to peaces. Bill Kempe and May Angeline Kapp can testify as to whether it's peaces or pieces. No, they didn't marry each other. Somebody else. Manager Bunn doesn't allow any lovin' around the office—except between salesmen and exhibs.

Theater Inaugurates "Pay-as-You-Leave" Idea

THE latest and one of the most successful innovations in theater management is reported by the Paramount Cincinnati office. Messrs. Judy and Gay, of the Tabb Theater, at Mt. Sterling, Kentucky, recently inaugurated a "pay-as-you-leave" system of conducting their business, which acted as a decided stimulus on business.

The managers of this theater contended that the theatrical business was one of the few that collected their revenue before the people knew whether they liked it or not, and that they had decided to only collect admissions after patrons had witnessed their show.

Regarding their unique experiment one of the managers said: "We made the proposition that we would not sell any tickets as people entered the show, but would sell them as they went out. We further stated that if they liked the show they would please stop at the box office and pay the regular price of admission. If they did not like the show they would not pay us one cent. Of course we stood at the door to see how many would think the picture not worth ten cents. To our surprise there was only one couple that left that did not stop and pay for their tickets. On Tuesday night, however, he stopped at the box office and asked if he did not walk out last night without paying. Of course we stated that we did not know. He said, 'Well, I did, and I had no intention of doing so, for it was one of the best pictures that I have ever seen.' We were very much pleased at the advertising, for that was all you could hear the people talking about. It was so different from anything they had ever had sprung on them, it took them completely by surprise."

Chicago Exhibitors Expanding

Alfred Hamburger, one of the leading motion picture operators of the city, is invading Chicago's suburbs. Following his acquisition of the leading theater in Wilmette for high-class motion pictures, which occurred quite recently, he announces that he has taken over the Gayety Theater at Ninety-second street and Commercial avenue, South Chicago. This is a 1,200-seat house which heretofore has been devoted to all kinds of theatrical entertainment, including vaudeville, "legitimate" drama and pictures.

The Gayety is the most prominent theater in the hustling suburb. Until it came into the possession of Mr. Hamburger it was an important link in the chain of playhouses on the Allardt circuit. Under the present management it will be devoted to the highest class pictures, a feature which always distinguishes Alfred Hamburger houses.

Mr. Hamburger operates a dozen or more theaters in Chicago, covering every section of the city, including the down-town district.

The Gayety closes for repairs and overhauling Wednesday, October 18, and will remain closed until the opening day, October 21. Meanwhile painters, decorators and carpenters will have worked day and night renovating the playhouse and fitting it appropriately to receive the Alfred Hamburger policy of choice photoplays, courtesy and attention.

New Combination Theater for New York

Construction of the new million dollar B. S. Moss Theater, at Broadway and 181st street, New York, has been begun, and at the same time the old Wadsworth Theater, less than a stone's throw away, will be transformed into a department store. Excavation and leveling for the construction of the theater will begin on Monday, and it is expected that the building will be completed next September. It will be two stories high, situated on a plot of land, 150 feet on Broadway, 200 feet on 181st street, 178 feet on Bennett avenue, and 201 feet on the north. The area includes thirteen city lots.

Two entrances on Broadway and another on West 181st street will enable the building to dispense its patrons quickly. These 3,500 persons will have the advantage of extraordinary fire exits, enabling the house to empty in record time. The exits are said to be 30 per cent in excess of the building law requirements.

Manager Thomas Soriero of the Park Theater, Boston, had no difficulty in drawing crowds when Gladys Hulette appeared at his house. Perhaps that's the reason he gave a banquet in her honor; perhaps that wasn't the reason at all. This picture shows the charming little Thanhouser and Pathe star in overalls climbing down a ladder from the window of her rooms above the theater.

It will have many new and novel features for the comfort and convenience of its patrons. No stray draughts will cause colds to the audience. These wandering draughts are avoided by a new system of ventilation. The air within the house will be renewed every minute.

Several special lighting schemes will be tried as it is sought to avoid light errors now common while moving pictures are on the screen. Diffused light, or indirect rays, behind thick-toned glass, will prevent any light from straining the eyes of the audience. There are many other mechanical features making it the last word in theater construction. The stage depth will be 45 feet, whereas there is usually only 30 feet. A steel curtain will be used instead of asbestos.

Fire hazard will be reduced to its least degree in many features other than the exit arrangements. Actors' dressing rooms will be detached from the back stage, something never before tried. They will have a small two-story house in the rear, slightly detached from the main theater building. The audience will sit in chairs fashioned after those in use in the Metropolitan Opera House. Late-comers will not annoy the patrons under the seating plan, for the seats are divided into three sections, with three aisles and one cross-over on the orchestra floor. The same plan will be used in the balcony.

The decorative scheme of the theater will be in French renaissance throughout, with an exterior of stucco and polished granite. The same principle will be observed inside. It will be colored in old rose, French gray, ivory and gold.

Everything will be finished in a huge and elaborate manner, making it possible to produce pictures, vaudeville, opera or stage spectacles.

"For Ladies Only" Draws Crowds

There have been few if any films presented in Chicago that have attracted more attention from the public and the trade than "The Unborn," produced by the Kulee company and now holding out crowds of women at the Band Box Theater on Madison street, in the heart of the city's downtown district.

The title of the feature and the fact that it has been extensively advertised "for women only" has brought out amazing hordes of the feminine sex. Long lines have stood along the street waiting for entrance at practically every show for two weeks. The accompanying illustration shows the crowds waiting in the rain at nine o'clock at night. It is estimated that 30,000 or 40,000 women have been turned away.

Manager Rudolph arranged free lunch hour shows for working girls during the second "women's only" week. The first free show was for factory girls. Other lunch hour shows were arranged for department store girls, domestics, hotel and telephone employes.

Whether the men of Chicago will be able to see "The Unborn" at the Band Box Theater remains up to the women to decide. As long as they flock to the theater in the numbers that have seen the picture already, men will be barred. So far no man has been allowed to see the photoplay. The little playhouse is opened every morning at nine o'clock and it is close to midnight before the doors are locked.

Gives Away a Ford

By A. R. M. Sutton

John W. Hamrick, of the Rex theater, Seattle, is advertising just now "The Universal Car and the Universal first-run pictures at the Rex." The Universal car is, of course, the Ford, and the Universal pictures Mr. Hamrick takes it for granted need no explanation. The point is that to introduce with a bang his new Universal Program, for which he has just signed, Mr. Hamrick is going to give away a 1917 model five-passenger Ford auto. The person receiving the greatest number of votes will be the winner, and the right to vote is obtained by buying admission tickets to the Rex, fifty votes going with each regular ten cent admission ticket, twenty-five with each child's ticket, and seventy-five with each fifteen cent loge ticket. The contest is to run for six weeks.

Hobart Henley at Universal City is playing the featured lead in and directing a five-reel drama, "Little Italy."

An Hour's Entertainment for a Dime

SOMEBODY will always have to take care of the one-hour show. No matter how ambitious the producers may be to make big, expensive, multiple reel features and long serials, and no matter how competent they may be, to carry out that effort, the sixty-minute program, complete in itself, will always be demanded by a great many exhibitors and by a distinct and permanent portion of the public.

The five-reel feature has become one of the standards of motion picture production. Practically it is a one-hour show in itself. Theoretically its screening should take more than an hour, since that is at the rate of more than sixteen inches of film, or about twenty-two pictures to the second; and that is much faster than the camera that took them was operated. But we will call it an hour's show, because that is the schedule followed by most exhibitors.

A good five-reel feature is a complete entertainment, and enough for anyone's money. But some exhibitors, and a great many theater patrons, do not see it that way. They want to put something more on the program, so that the appeal of the show will not depend entirely upon a single production. So they add, usually, a two-reel comedy. Sometimes a single or split is used. In most cases, it will be agreed, something is added to the five-reel feature; comparatively few exhibitors run just the feature and nothing else.

A two-reel comedy, run at the same rate of speed (generally too fast) lengthens the show to an hour and twenty-four minutes—practically an hour and a half. There is no valid objection to a ninety-minute show, except that some exhibitors protest they cannot make any money on it at ten cents admission. The price must be raised to fifteen cents.

The only reason the price for an hour-and-a-half show should not at once be made universally fifteen cents lies in a fixed belief on the part of many exhibitors that the ten cent show must prevail ultimately; that in spite of the few film masterpieces that name their own price, the backbone of the industry is the ten cent house.

We do not believe anything is gained by giving the people too much for their money. A reasonable value, with a sure and reasonable profit, is the first law of business. An hour's entertainment for a dime is reasonable value beyond all doubt; a reasonable profit can be made on it, where a longer show for the same money would make any profit at all doubtful. For lengthening the show reduces the profits, not singly, but doubly. It not only costs more, but cuts down the number of shows per day. A five hundred seat house can reasonably run seven one-hour shows a day, giving a possible capacity for $350 in dimes, with a weekly film rental of say $200. The same house can run only four one-and-one-half hour shows, or a possible capacity of $200 in dimes (or $300 at fifteen cents) with a weekly film rental of say $240. Other things being equal, it is plain that the one-hour show is the more profitable. And a considerable number of exhibitors are coming to believe that an hour of picture entertainment satisfies ninety per cent of the public.

The five-reel feature seems to afford an ideal one-hour show. Apparently the one- or two-reel "filler" used with it is not essential to a dime's worth of entertainment. Yet there always remains a vital objection to this theory: That the people will not learn to enter a picture theater on schedule time. They will persist in attributing to it the characteristics of continuous vaudeville.

That is why most exhibitors try to give their programs a more or less continuous nature, by splitting them into two or three attractions.

It must be conceded that nothing is more distressing to the casual theater patron than to enter at the middle of a five-reel feature—or to strike it anywhere except at the beginning.

The show is spoiled for him because he sees it hind-end-to.

Most of that condition is the public's fault, because it will not learn or ask the hours of starting each show. Some of it is the exhibitor's fault because he does not make a more determined effort to educate the public to regular hours. Of the thousands of theaters that run features, how many keep their patrons reminded of the show hours?

This discussion reveals three theoretical classes of picture show. We say theoretical, because apparently not much attention has yet been given to reducing these principles to practice.

The neighborhood house, with its coterie of habitual patrons, could confine its program to one hour-length feature with entire satisfaction to everybody, provided it advertised and emphasized the hour at which each show started, or made it a point to start each show exactly on the even hour and so announced it.

The house located in a business district, at a street car transfer point, or in any location that makes its patronage preponderantly of the transient and casual sort, can profitably divide its hour program into two, or even three, parts; say a couple of two-reel subjects and a single or split. It need not have any definite hours at all; it is really a continuous performance house.

And for the house that can get away with a fifteen cent price (as a great many could that think they cannot), nothing can be better than the good old combination of a feature and a two-reeler.

This, also, is the ideal house for the serial.

There is plenty of room and plenty of appropriate locations for each and all of these classes of shows. And all of them are operating, with more or less success, right now. The only trouble is that not all exhibitors have learned to ask themselves whether the particular kind of program they are running is the kind that is best suited to the location and the patronage.

Figuring Profits in Advance

ONE is sometimes tempted to believe that the economics of the picture industry is developing into an exact science. The prospective theater owner can stand upon the curbstone in front of his tentative location and, with a pocket counter, can check off the passers-by with numerical accuracy, while his ordinary horse sense and powers of observation tell him what manner of folk they be, and whether they want entertainment or not. Thus, with practice and shrewdness, he determines in advance almost to a dollar what his attendance and his profits will be.

On the other end of the game, the producer appoints a local manager in each district, who proceeds at once to book (before it is born) the latest big feature for a hundred days, or maybe two or three hundred. By the time the picture appears before the eyes of its first audience, it is under contract to be shown to several hundred more audiences, all nicely done up in businesslike packages with their individual and aggregate profits calculated to a cent or two.

No wonder the manager of the musical comedy or spoken drama, handling his business proposition with a dice box, gazes with envy and chagrin upon the fore-ordained success of the picture industry.

Still, it is stated on good authority that even some picture men regard their particular game as a gamble.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

TO STIMULATE business for "Manhattan Madness," with Douglas Fairbanks, the Victoria Theater of Rochester, New York, mailed to the leading families of the city a pass to the show. The ticket was good for an orchestra circle seat for one person, the idea that one patron usually brings one or two more.

Mayor Overholser of Oklahoma City, has censored the picture, "Where Are My Children?"

On October 22, Thomas Ince's "Civilization" became the oldest attraction on Broadway, New York. It passed its three hundredth performance at that time.

D. W. Griffith's spectacle "Intolerance," continues a very successful run at the Liberty Theater, New York City. The spectacle has just begun runs in Los Angeles and San Francisco.

Manager Irvin, of the Irvin Theater, Bloomington, Illinois, has re-booked "Tess of the Storm Country." This is the third time he has played it in less than two months, each time to capacity business.

There are thirty motion picture theaters in Detroit being investigated by the police department because of failure to secure a new license since August first. The city ordinance requires new licenses to be taken out upon that date each year.

Picketing of theaters has been forbidden by city ordinance in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma. The penalty for its violation is a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $50 and be confined in the city jail for a period not exceeding thirty days, or both.

The Wonderland Theater, of Uniontown, Pennsylvania, gives a performance every morning at seven o'clock for the benefit of school children. These early morning matinees are well attended. Several Pittsburgh houses are considering a test of the innovation.

V. V. Thompson, manager of a vaudeville theater, plead guilty at Fort Worth, Texas, October 13, to operating his theater on Sunday and was fined $25.00 and costs. All of the other Sunday opening cases tried in Forth Worth recently have involved picture theaters.

W. E. Moon, owner of the Rex Theater, Ritzville, Washington, is soon to open a new Rex in Sprague. He has purchased the latest equipment for the new theater, including a Mimusa gold fibre screen, a Powers 6B cameragraph, and Andrews chairs. All the other furniture and fittings of the theater are to be of the very finest.

Alfred de Manby, formerly artistic director of the Rialto Theater of New York, the Colonial of Chicago, and other large houses, is now producing special feature acts for use in motion picture theaters. These acts are produced through the Orchestra Sales and Supply Company of 1465 Broadway, New York City.

While auditing the books of Scott County, Iowa, the auditor found an item that the supervisors made out—twenty tickets to take a murder jury to a show. Besides commenting on the excessive size of the jury, the examiner decided that a picture show was no place for a murder jury, and he refused to allow the warrant.

Dr. Burris A. Jenkins, pastor of the Linwood Boulevard Christian church, in a sermon recently delivered at Kansas City, Missouri, stated that the film is here to stay, but that just now the public taste for pictures has palled because of the predominance of salacious sex and problem plays. "The sex play has no place on the picture stage," he said.

For the benefit of Russian Jewish sufferers in the European war zone it is planned to present some well known play in Yiddish at one of the Los Angeles theaters in the near future. Harry Mann, well known character actor at Universal City, will have charge of the production and play one of the leading roles.

The LaSalle Opera House of Chicago has played "Where Are My Children?" for thirteen weeks to more than seven hundred fifty thousand people. The feature will be run two weeks more and will have established a record for the Windy City. On November fourth it will give place to "Less Than the Dust," Mary Pickford's first production.

In the opinion of the board of Aldermen of St. Louis, many of the motion picture theaters of that city are in need of better lighting so that in case of an emergency patrons could make their egress more readily. Most of the better houses are well lighted by means of the indirect lighting system. Some of the smaller and less modern houses, however, are darker than is absolutely necessary.

G. A. Faris, formerly assistant branch manager for V. L. S. E. in Los Angeles, has taken charge of Greater Vitagraph's Northwestern territory with headquarters at Seattle. Mr. Faris' pleasing personality is sure to increase Vitagraph's bookings in that part of the country. Tom North, former V. L. S. E. manager at Seattle has gone to New York with the intention, it is reported, of making connections with some other film concern.

Four new Baird motion picture machines, which cost $500 each, have been received by Dan Meyers, manager of the Broadway and Strand theaters, at Muskogee, Oklahoma. Two of the machines have been set up in the Broadway, and the other two will be placed in the Strand when completed. The machines are among the biggest and best on the market. Each machine will accommodate four reels of film and is guaranteed to eliminate all flicker.

The Bureau of Immigration is arranging to screen a number of educational films for the use of the Immigration bureau in its official work. The first picture to be screened will be the Americanization of Stefan Skoles, describing the progress of naturalization of aliens. Earl Schenck, a well known actor will play the leading roll.

In Stefan Skoles the character is taken from his native country and the progress thereafter, from his arrival at Ellis Island to the act of final naturalization, is depicted on the screen.

A. S. Rothapfel, manager of the Rialto Theater of New York, has for the past few weeks introduced dancing into his high class picture performances. The latest specialty of this sort offered by Mr. Rothapfel were six classical dancers who performed what he calls on his program a "petite ballet," with special lighting and scenic effects.

There's a good advertising man at the Y. M. C. A., Coatesville, Pennsylvania. That branch runs pictures and knows how to "jolly" people in to see them. One week a man had the lead in every picture booked, so this ad writer came out with this:

Men's Week!! No ladies allowed on this program. There isn't a doubt but that the ladies will be present in large numbers—in the audience, for here are six of the most popular leading men in pictures, each one in a subject especially adapted to his talents. We are sure that every one of these attractions will prove to be a winner, and each improved by the company it keeps.

According to L. Grandin Grossman, a Washington, D. C., lawyer, Grand Rapids, Michigan, is being considered by eastern capitalists as the location of a large motion picture production plant. Mr. Grossman has been here for several days looking over the ground and is pleased with the prospects. He says the proposition will be laid before the directors of the Association of Commerce in a definite way within the next two weeks. The proposition carries an investment of several hundred thousand dollars.

The Strand Theater of New York City is showing the only official pictures taken of the battle of Somme. On account of the length of the program the battle pictures were divided into two installments and shown on different days. The feature run in connection with the battle pictures is "The Rainbow Princess," Frohman's production with Ann Pennington. On the same bill was also shown the fourth chapter of Ditmar's "Living Book of Nature," travel and educational studies, and the Strand topical review. The Strand concert orchestra was supplemented by the Hawaiian Players from Zeigfield's Follies.

The first anniversary of the Chambers Street Theater of Phillipsburg, New Jersey, was celebrated recently. Souvenirs were given away and this announcement was carried on the front cover of the house program:

This week being the first anniversary of the establishment of the Chambers Street Theater, it is only fitting and proper that the management take this opportunity to thank the public for the patronage during the past year and assure them that it will be our earnest endeavor during this coming year to exhibit such productions that are of the highest merit and attempt to surpass anything we have done in the past.

Sincerely yours,

Chambers Street Theater.

Exhibitors throughout the country are now receiving an especially clever bit of advertising matter which can be adapted for their own purposes. It is a dainty little pink folder issued by the Oliver Morosco Company. When the little slip is opened there appears three little cut out figures of Vivian Martin, standing out from the rest of the booklet, and below is a question which stirs the interest of the reader in the play, "Her Father's Son," Miss Martin's latest vehicle. Exhibitors can get these little folders from the Morosco company or from any Paramount exchange at the rate of $3.50 a thousand. They really should be a first class business stimulator.

Alfred Hamburger, one of Chicago's prominent exhibitors, has secured all of the greater Vitagraph features to be presented in the Ziegfeld Theater and all outlying houses controlled by him for first showing in Chicago, which means that the patrons of the Hamburger houses will view these pictures two weeks before any other house in their neighborhood will present them. Mr. Hamburger also announces that he has contracted for a showing over his circuit of the revival of Mary Pickford in "Caprice," "Tess of the Storm Country" and "In the Bishop's Carriage." "Ramona" is another big feature now being shown in all the outlying houses of the Hamburger circuit and phenomenal business has been the result.

The Clemmer Theater of Seattle recently ran "Purity" for a week and one day. The reason Mr. Clemmer decided to open with it on Saturday, instead of Sunday, was that he might profit from the mouth to mouth advertising, which is so effective. For a week or two before the coming of "Purity" at each of the Clemmer's shows Malvin G. Winstock, well known in the northwest through his former connection with the Peoples Amusement Company, addressed the audience with an explanation of the real meaning of Audrey Munson's beautiful feature, illustrating his talk with a few slides from the picture. It was only those who did not hear him speak who were disappointed at not being shocked, when they saw "Purity." This feature brought to the Clemmer its record crowds for the year.

Atlantic City, Iowa, awoke the other morning to find itself placarded from end to end with posters of all shapes, colors and sizes, urging the inhabitants, in huge letters, to buy a certain sort of pill warranted to cure all human ills. This is how the posters read:

Mike's and Louie's
Panacea.

For All Ills.

Take a Pill Every Hour.

Pray and Have Faith.

The posters created a lot of talk, then Manager Frost of the Garden Theater came out with the announcement that Mike and Louie were holding forth at the Garden in Mutual's "A Million for Mary." The S. R. O. sign was hauled out.

The first showing of the big Metro production of "Romeo and Juliet," with Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne as co-stars, was held at the Broadway Theater, New York, on Thursday morning, October 19. An elaborate musical setting, prepared by the famous composers, Irénée Bergé and Samuel M. Berg, and played by an orchestra of forty pieces, accompanied the splendid screen offering. Beginning Sunday, October 21, "Romeo and Juliet" will be shown to the public for a week at the Broadway Theater.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

WHAT are you doing to attract the eye of the casual passerby in the way of signs and banners advertising your theater and exploiting your program for the evening? If you can get the people to come as far as the door because they are attracted by your display of electric signs or clever advertising your battle is three-quarters won for they will generally go on in to see if you really are living up to what you are promising in your outside display. Of course the more numerous and brilliant the lights the farther your display can be seen and on a cold, dreary, rainy or winter night the front of a motion picture theater blazing with lights is a magnet and promises an alluring and tempting place in which to be cheered up and enjoy oneself. Don't be careless about this part of your business. Attract attention. Get the people interested. Make them believe from the outside that it is worth their while to go inside. Do not quibble over the additional money spent in this way in the first place for it will mean a decidedly larger revenue later on. This is a permanent investment, and one on which you will realize large dividends.

81—The people haven't been coming to my theater very well since I opened this fall. I do not have nearly as many on an average as I did in the early summer. I closed during July and August as all the houses do in this small city and people have not seemed to get into the spirit of the thing as yet. At first I laid it to lovely fall weather but now that the weather is more unsettled and the days are constantly getting shorter the business does not seem to pick up as it should. I was wondering if you could suggest something in the way of a special night or something that I could offer to start them coming again. I do not think there is any cause for this on account of the pictures I show for I have talked with three or four other exhibitors in the city and they say they have found just the same thing—that their attendance is cut just one third.

While you cannot help being concerned over this condition I believe it is only temporary, especially as the other exhibitors of your city are experiencing the same thing. Probably now that the Indian summer is over and winter sets in the theaters will rapidly regain their average attendance. Meanwhile I expect you are anxious to increase your box office receipts and turn the attention of the populace theaterward as soon as possible. If, as you suggest, you plan some particularly unique entertainment for a few nights, or a week, it may gain their attention and interest.

This time of year the one thing more than any other which is interesting all the women—and I believe many of the men too, although they may scoff at the idea—is the fashions for winter. Everyone is getting their winter wardrobe together and are interested in knowing just what is the latest style and seeing models of the approved fashions for winter. Why not, then, take advantage of this interest which you know is paramount at present and have a fashion show at your theater. I do not mean by this to show the fashion films, although these could be utilized also if you so desire, but have a real fashion show with live models displaying the latest in gowns, wraps, suits and men's apparel. At each performance have the regular run of pictures and then add about half an hour of this show. You will find that the local merchants will be only too glad to co-operate with you in this matter as it will be splendid advertising for them. They will be very willing to supply the suits, gowns, and also the latest in men's apparel, and will probably be glad to allow their own models to appear so that the extra attraction will really cost you nothing at all. To create even greater interest you might offer a prize to the young lady receiving the largest number of votes as the most beautiful model.

If you have a mailing list it would be a good idea to send each person an invitation to the fashion show saying that it will run three nights or the whole week, if you think this feasible, and that the styles will be changed each night. Be sure to have this variety each evening so as to insure the attendance at all three shows or every night if you continue it that long. Have throwaways liberally distributed over the town and take good space in the newspapers, as well as advertising the show extensively on your own screen.

Undoubtedly the merchants will readily co-operate with some display advertising in their windows advising that their latest models will be displayed in your theater. Also their advertising in the local papers will undoubtedly carry a statement of their joining with you in the style show, all of which would give you a great deal of free advertising.

I believe you will find that this innovation will bring out a good crowd of women and many men as well. And it may start the habit of theater going again so that your regular average will be one more attained.

82—The manager of a theater which is just far enough away from mine so that while he does not draw on my patronage to any great extent will take away some of the cream if I don't watch out, has recently been admitting all children under ten years of age free if they are accompanied by adults. While this has really not affected my box office receipts as yet still it has made a little dissatisfaction among some of the mothers of families who think if he can afford to let the children in free I ought to do so as well. They have not yet left me to go to his theater on account of this, however, because it is a pretty long walk for the children unless they take the car, and of course the added expense of the carfare would just about make up for the difference between charging and not charging for the children. Do you think I would be wiser to follow his lead in this matter or stick to my price of five cents for the children as I have been doing?

I do not see any reason why a manager should sacrifice all remuneration for children. They occupy a seat for which he could otherwise be getting the full admission of ten cents or fifteen cents as the case may be and the concession of allowing them half-price is sufficient. It is a wise policy to admit children free to all of the matinees except Saturday because on the other days of the week the seats are rarely all taken anyway. These shows are run primarily for the mothers and they cannot come unless they bring the children, who are generally small and of less than the school age.

But at the evening performance there is no reason why such a rule should be made. The competitive manager is probably trying this just to see if he cannot entice some of your patrons away from you. As a matter of fact, since you say he is so far away that he really is not a formidable competitor I do not believe there will be enough difference in your attendance on account of this to make as great a loss in the box office receipts as would be caused by not charging admission for the children.

I do believe that in a neighborhood house the manager does well to make a reduced rate for the children because he wishes his house to be considered as a family theater and it makes the parents feel better when they take the whole brood along to know that the manager is willing to co-operate with them to this extent.

The neighborhood in which your theater is located should be the guide in this matter. If you are catering to a well to do class of people to whom the nickel or dime for amusement is not a consideration then charge a straight rate of ten cents or fifteen cents for both adults and children, except in the case of the very small youngsters. These parents can afford to pay for the children and will be perfectly willing to do so, in fact, will put down the full admission price without giving it a thought. In a community where the price of admission to a motion picture theater two or three times a week for the whole family has to be looked upon as an item of expense, then the children should be allowed to come in at half price, and it may be that an exception should be made in poorer districts so that the children may come in free with the parents or they will all be kept away from the theater. The manager should judge his neighborhood and his class of patrons in this respect and be guided thereby.

83—My theater is located in the downtown section of a western city. I get a great many of my patrons from the business people on their lunch hour but I could almost double my receipts if I could get more women into the house. There have been one or two cases here recently where men have gotten rather fresh with some of the girls in some of the motion picture theaters and the newspapers have made a good deal of the story so that all of the theaters have been hurt by it. Nothing of the sort has ever happened in my house but of course I suffer with the others. I suppose this is one reason why the business women do not come into my theater as they used to and I have been trying to think of some way to get them back—for I need the money.

It is always harder to get the trade of the business women in a motion picture theater than that of the men. One reason why your patronage has fallen off just now may be that they are all interested in buying winter clothes and so are spending all their noon hours shopping. I know that around Christmas time there is always a very noticeable falling off of woman patronage during the noon hour because they are all buying Christmas presents and spending their time in the stores. However, the publicity given to the unpleasant experiences of the women in the theaters of your city undoubtedly has a very great deal to do with the matter. The girls probably no longer feel free to come in alone or two of them together to see all they can in an hour.

To make a test of whether or not this is at the bottom of the diminishing attendance why not try setting aside a certain portion of your house for ladies alone. If you have a balcony in your theater it might be well to reserve this entirely for ladies unescorted. If you have not, then just a certain section can be set aside. Advertise this fact freely in your newspaper publicity and also exploit it by announcements in front of your theater and so assure the ladies that they will be perfectly free from all fear of unpleasant attentions in your theater. There are a great many women I imagine who do feel diffident about going into a theater alone at any time and it might be that an announcement of this special thoughtfulness for the ladies might bring in a great many shoppers who otherwise would hesitate about entering a motion picture theater alone.

If you are especially desirous of getting the business women's trade you might try making a reduced rate for the ladies during certain hours of the day. If you charge ten cents admission allow the women to come in for five cents. If your theater at present is not full every day at the ten cent price you will not be cutting the revenue from each seat you could otherwise sell for ten cents but will be adding the extra receipts from all the seats you are selling at five cents which would otherwise be vacant, and after you have formed the habit among the business women and others to drop into your theater for their recreation you can again raise the price to ten cents for all.

Do not err to the other extreme, however, by making such a very decided point of catering to women that the men will feel they are not wanted or that it is a woman's theater to too great an extent for the main support of the downtown house, especially between the hours of eleven-thirty to two-thirty is the business man. He does not care to spend all his time in the stores shopping or gossiping over the tea table, but wants some amusement and a chance for a good laugh—and the motion picture has solved this problem for him. The largest proportion of your attendance during these hours will always be the men and they will come back again and again if you give them the sort of program they like.

NORFOLK BARS SEX FILMS

To Ward Off Local Board of Censors Exhibitors Sign Agreement to Show No Sex Problem Plays in Their Theaters

When the board of aldermen of Norfolk, Virginia, threatened to appoint five citizens to act as censors of the motion pictures shown in that city, the exhibitors decided to forestall this action by becoming their own censors, and they signed an agreement barring sex problem plays from their programs.

The theater owners declare that the police have full authority to protect the public morals, and that, anyway, Norfolk theaters do not show indecent pictures.

Following a series of conferences with the backers of the proposed censorship ordinance the exhibitors signed a resolution agreeing to certain things which will bring about better results than could the legislation. The ordinance was thereupon withdrawn.

The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas, we, the undersigned owners, operators and managers of the motion picture theaters in the city of Norfolk, Virginia, sincerely appreciate the spirit in which Mr. I. Walke Truxtun and others have advocated for the city of Norfolk, Virginia, a policy of eliminating the presentation in the said city of Norfolk of photoplays which will have tendency to shock and affect the morals of the community, and

Whereas, it is our policy to maintain a high standard presentation of photoplays in the city of Norfolk, Virginia, and co-operate with Mr. Truxton in this movement, and

Whereas, we recognize that the laws on the statute books are sufficient to enable the mayor and police department of the city of Norfolk, Virginia, to properly safeguard the public against the presentation of any lewd, immoral, or improper photoplay, and

Whereas, it is our desire to co-operate with the mayor and city police department whenever they know of any violation such as hereinbefore recited:

We, the undersigned, do respectfully on our part agree that we will not contract for, or allow to be presented, in any theaters in which we are interested, any immoral or sex problem photoplay.

It is signed by eleven prominent cinema managers.

These scenes of love and death are faint suggestions of the power and beauty of Metro's production of the old, old story, "Romeo and Juliet," written by the first scenarioist, Mr. W. Shakespeare of Avon and London. Francis X. Bushman and the captivating Beverly Bayne carry the leading roles.

Metro's "Romeo and Juliet" Opens

ELABORATE SHAKESPEAREAN PRODUCTION PLEASES NEW YORK

SHAKESPEARE'S "Romeo and Juliet" has been most successfully immortalized on the screen by the Metro Pictures Corporation. The featured personages are Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne.

That the elaborate production is an unusual success was demonstrated beyond a doubt Thursday morning, October 19, when a private exhibition of the play, for critics and Shakespearean scholars, took place in the Broadway theater, New York. A beautiful musical setting, especially arranged from Gounod's opera and Tschaikowsky's symphonic overture, accompanied the picture.

The audience sat closely attentive for two hours while the great old love tragedy unfolded itself. For every situation presented there was a musical theme that blended perfectly with it. When the last scene faded away there was a burst of applause that lasted for several minutes.

"Splendid!" was one of the comments heard as the spectators passed out of the house. "It is a beautiful and absorbing production. It is the first time the real spirit of Shakespeare has been successfully interpreted in motion pictures."

For the exhibition almost 2,000 invitations were sent out. About 1,600 responded, despite the rain. In the audience were many prominent musicians who were eager to hear the musical setting arranged by Irènèe Bergè and Samuel M. Berg.

Symphony Orchestra of Forty Pieces

James C. Bradford conducted the orchestra of forty pieces. The musicians in it were members of the Philharmonic and Damrosch forces. First there was an overture specially composed for the production. As it was concluded the immortal love story began on the screen. There was Francis X. Bushman, as Romeo, fancying himself in love with Rosaline.

Rosaline jilts him. He believes himself heartbroken. Benvolio and Mercutio appear. They offer comfort. They tell him of the great Capulet feast. The production here takes in the first scene of the play, the fight between the servants of the Capulets and the Montagues. Thereafter the motion picture production follows the Shakespearean play, scene for scene and act for act. This artistic achievement is heightened by the flashing on the screen of quotations selected from the play to fit the charming picturizations.

Throughout the eight reels shown there are beautiful picture effects—things that could not be shown with equal power on the speaking stage. There are hundreds of men and women in the rich costumes of that particular Italian era, castles, dungeons, picturesque streets in Verona and Mantua, gorgeous woodlands and, most impressive of all, the great balcony scene.

Imagine all of this in pictures and then imagine music that fits perfectly into it—music that expresses the life and emotions of every character shown. This is "Romeo and Juliet" on the screen. It is more than a motion picture. It actually is a screen grand opera. There are motifs for all the principal characters. For the scene where Romeo declares his love to Rosaline a special musical motif was composed. They composed music also for the scene in which Romeo kills Tybalt while Prince Escalus and his retinue are approaching over the hills.

To accomplish the end desired it was necessary for the composers to interpret the approach of Escalus and the fight in separate orchestrations. Brass instruments are used for Escalus, while the orchestral ones portray the fight. In the great love scene between Romeo and Juliet the aria from the Tschaikowsky symphonic overture is used.

One of the most beautiful of the musical settings goes with the scene at the Capulet feast, when Romeo sees Juliet and makes love to her in the garden. In Gounod's opera a madrigal is sung. This has been reorchestrated for the Metro production.

The music of Gounod and Tschaikowsky is blended for the chamber scene. But the pinnacle of the orchestration is reached when Romeo is led to believe Juliet is dead. The motion picture shows his servant riding to Mantua. Romeo, banished, spies him as he approaches and is overjoyed, believing he brings good tidings from Juliet. Here the music is light and gay, but there is a sudden change to symbolize the tragic grief of Romeo when he is told that his bride has passed away.

Mr. Bushman makes an admirable Romeo. His every gesture is full of expression. Miss Bayne, as Juliet, is a beautifully tragic figure.

As to the details of the great production, the scenario for it was arranged by John Arthur, Rudolph de Cordova and John W. Noble. It was directed by Mr. Noble, Edward Elsner and Rudolph de Cordova, assisted by a staff of Shakespearean experts. The cost of the production is said to have been $250,000.

All of the leading characters spoke Shakespeare's lines while going through the appropriate action. Several of the greatest theatrical families of America and England are represented in the cast, which includes a Booth, a Sothern, a Mantell, a Kemble and a Hall Caine. Adella Barker, who won fame on the speaking stage in Shakespearean roles, plays the part of the nurse.

Metro reports a big list of bookings on the production as a result of the advance showing last week. "Romeo and Juliet" opened on Sunday, October 22, at the Broadway Theater, New York.

Earle Fox Joins Metro

Earle Fox, who has won fame in the "legitimate" as well as in motion pictures, has joined the Metro forces and is supporting Mme. Petrova in her new production at the Popular Plays and Players Studio. In the play now being produced Fox is seen as a weakling who fails in everything he attempts because he is unable to control a craving for drugs.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew Off for Cuba

News Item: Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew, Metro stars, who have been breaking all records in producing one-reel comedy sketches in the Rolfe studio, have sailed for Cuba where they will spend several weeks in getting a much needed rest.

Behind that simple statement lurks a tragedy of the World's Series games, for Mr. and Mrs. Drew have gone away from here on other people's baseball money. Here is the way it came about: Mr. Drew, a student of baseball and an ardent "rooter" for the Yanks, figured it out long ago that Boston would win the World's Series. From the first game on he offered to back Boston to an unlimited amount, and when the smoke cleared away he had enough to support a neat little trip. It is said he extracted liberal bets from John Noble, Ed Carewe, B. A. Rolfe, Mabel Taliaferro and Ethel Barrymore.

Cleveland Managers Fight Music Union

At a meeting of the Exhibitors' League of Cleveland the exhibitors all expressed themselves as in sympathy with the stand taken by Manager Schwartz of the Erie Theater in his fight against the Musicians' Protective Association. A motion was passed to the effect that each member of the league be assessed ten dollars to make up a legal fund for the purpose of taking such steps as are necessary to protect the exhibitors against the operators' union, the poster union and musicians' union, which are menacing the freedom of motion picture exhibitors in Cleveland.

Several years ago, when Ernest Schwartz opened the Erie Theater, he employed a union orchestra at a very heavy cost, with the understanding that if the expenditure did not prove to be warranted the union orchestra would be withdrawn in favor of some music less expensive and more in accord with the receipts of the house. In time it proved necessary to do this. Now the musicians' union is boycotting the Erie Theater and passing cards urging patrons to seek their entertainment elsewhere. In spite of the fact that the Erie Theater is located in a hotbed of unionism, in the heart of the district where the garment makers dwell, Mr. Schwartz has defied the union and refuses to concede to their demands.

Nature's Roof Leaking

Mother Nature has been showing Helen Holmes and her Signal-Mutual Company a rather inhospitable roof in the famed Yosemite Valley where they are filming the new thrill serial, "A Lass of the Lumberlands," in which Miss Holmes is featured.

"They told us," complains Miss Holmes, "that if we would take our camp to the El Portal region, on the south edge of Yosemite National Park, we'd absolutely rid ourselves of the unseasonably cold and gloomy weather round about Arcata and Eureka. They said that not in the memory of the longest and grayest-bearded inhabitant of the Californias had there been anything but lavish warm sunshine and baby-blue sky and heavenly atmosphere there at this time of year.

"Yes, well. We changed to El Portal, and now look, you! A regular funeral-day sky. Cold rains, the wettest I ever had anything to do with. Then sleet. Presently a douse of hail. Now a whole lot of snow stuff that looks very beautiful indeed from the open fire-side of a sitting room window but wasn't requested by us at all."

Famous Captures Frank McIntyre

Frank McIntyre, the celebrated comedian, will make his debut on the screen under the auspices of the Famous Players Film Company, in the picturization of his greatest stage success, "The Traveling Salesman," by James Forbes.

This typical American comedy created a mirth-sensation during its engagement at the Liberty Theater, New York, a few years ago, when under the management of the late Henry B. Harris, Mr. McIntyre's inimitable interpretation of the funny drummer was received as one of the most humorous character creations ever contributed to the stage. Mr. McIntyre has had an interesting stage history, having traversed all the theatrical paths that lead to stardom. He played in "Captain Malley," "A Poor Man," "My Wife's Husband," "Major Andre," and "The Hat Salesman."

Stars in Mutual's Crown

HOUSEHOLD WORDS AMONG THE NAMES OF PLAYERS

A LOOK over the studios of the Mutual Film Corporation's producing companies discloses a large number of widely recognized stars of the silent drama and the names of many are household words. And in the supporting companies, in the directing forces, in the scenario staff as well, appear the names and faces of many others without whom a complete history of the development of the photodrama could not be written.

At the studios of the American Film Corporation, Inc., at Santa Barbara, are Mary Miles Minter, Richard Bennett, C. William Kolb, Max Dill and William Russell, Broadway-famed and cinema-famed in all parts of the world where the shadow drama has taken their striking personalities. To them have fallen the leading roles in the Mutual Star Production series.

At the same studios are Anna Little, Helene Rosson, Winnifred Greenwood, Frank Borzage, Franklin Ritchie and Edward Coxen, stars whose success and reputation have been more or less Mutual made, since their development from minor parts into the spot light of stardom has come in almost every instance at the American studio. The Mutual Masterpictures, five-part feature productions of weekly release, owe much of their strength and originality to the adaptability and excellent screen personalities of these players.

There is no fixed position, nor any certain type of work ascribed to the remaining members of the Mutual's American cohorts—unless it be to Jack Richardson and George Field, the two "perfect" villains, and to Eugenie Forde, the vampire, to Charlotte Burton, leading woman with William Russell, and May Cloy, feminine lead with Kolb and Dill.

Alan Forrest, the handsome young leading man who supports Mary Miles Minter in her second Mutual Star Production, "Dulcie's Adventure," is seen frequently in a variety of roles for which his talent and versatility admirably fit him. Rhea Mitchell, whose career in pictures, launched under the directorship of Thomas Ince, has been most successful, is being presented for the present in the Richard Bennett series, in which she is being cast in the leading woman's role.

Aside from these players, at the American's studios, there is Margaret Shelby, the sister of Mary Miles Minter, who will make her first appearance in a Mutual release in "Faith," Miss Minter's third production for the Mutual. There are Lizette Thorne, Margaret Schafer, the character woman, Gertrude Le Brandt, Laura Sears, Queenie Rosson, Josephine Phillips, Rena Carlton, Bessie Banks, Marie Van Tassell, Josephine Clark, Clarence Burton, Perry Banks, William Stowell, Tom Chatterton, George Ahern, Harry Bernard, Charles Lynch, John Gough, King Clarke, Harry Von Meter, Charles Newton, Harvey Clark, Ashton Dearholt, John Singleton, Howard Crowe and Alfred Ferguson.

Orral Humprey, the eccentric American Beauty comedian, who heads his own company of Mutual funmakers, may also be seen at times in drama. One of the most excellent bits of acting ever executed for the screen is that of Mr. Humphrey's in the forthcoming Richard Bennett production, "Philip Holden, Waster." He also plays a dramatic role in "Esther of the People," a drama featuring Helene Rosson and Franklin Ritchie, as does Josephine Taylor, the leading actress of his Beauty comedies.

Joe Massey and Marion Rogers are seen regularly in Mr. Humphrey's funny pictures.

At Los Angeles the world-famed Charlie Chaplin, actor, scenario writer, director, and his popular company composed of Edna Purviance, Eric Campbell, Charlotte Mineau and other recognized comedians work daily on the mirth-making pictures which carry the inimitable Chaplin's genius to the ends of the earth.

At Arcata, Cal., where the Signal Film Corporation Company of players headed by Helen Holmes, is filming the new chapter-story in which the daring "railroad girl" is to be featured, "The Lass of the Lumberlands," many of the players who appeared with Miss Holmes in her previous productions may be found.

James P. McGowan, the master director, of course, is at the helm, and in the supporting cast are Katherine Goodrich, Florence Holmes, Thomas G. Lingham, Leo D. Maloney, Will Chapman, Paul C. Hurst and others, whose ability is equally well known.

Margarita Fischer, the beautiful screen favorite who recently signed with the Mutual, is at the western studios of the Pollard Picture Plays Company, of which Harry Pollard, Miss Fischer's director, is at the head.

Miss Fischer has been surrounded by the most popular motion picture players to support her in her Mutual productions. Jack Mower, for years leading man with the Western Vitagraph Company, John Steppling, former comedian of the American Beauty "Billy Van Duesen" series, and Beatrice Van, beautiful blonde of Mutual and Universal fame, are among those already cast and at work in Pollard productions. "Miss Jackie," Miss Fischer's first Mutual Star production, is under way at the coast.

There are three well known comedy stars whose eccentric and individual characteristics have won them a wide following at the Vogue studios at Los Angeles. They are Paddy McQuire, the laugh-provoking "Bungling Bill," as his screen personality and funny clothes have made him known, Ben Turpin and Rube Miller. Paddy McQuire is directed by the well known Harry Kernan, and is usually supported in the leading feminine role by Gypsy Abbott. Turpin and Miller are ordinarily cast together, and are supported by Lillian Hamilton. Mr. Miller himself is the director of this combination. Arthur Moon, Linna Templeton, and Larry Bowes play in the supporting casts, and appear with one or the other stars according to the character of the pictures which are being produced.

There are other faces familiar to screen stardom in Mutual pictures, including Florence Turner, who was one of the very first leading women of the motion pictures, and whose dramatic offerings are marked with the same stamp of originality which characterizes the personality of Miss Turner and her able director, Larry Trimble.

"The Price of Silence" prepared for the screen by Ida May Park, from the story of W. Carey Wonderly, is under production by Director Joseph De Grasse at Universal City.

PARAMOUNT ADVERTISING AIDS

Illustrated Book of Advertising Helps Distributed Free to Exhibitors to Assist in "Exhibitors' Aids" Campaign

Paramount Pictures Corporation has expended over $200,000 in accessories of every description to assist in its great "exhibitors' aids" campaign. The object of this campaign is to help the exhibitor in every manner possible in presenting the productions of Famous Players, Lasky, Morosco and Pallas. In each of the Paramount exchanges there has been established advertising and publicity departments, and an exhibitors' aid department.

Last week Paramount distributed to its exhibitors, through the exchanges, an elaborate catalogue of accessories under the title of "Paramount Advertising Aids," which represents the greatest distribution of free advertising material ever planned by a motion picture concern.

Illustrated facsimilies of the mat services issued by the Publicity Department are contained in the forepart of the book, included in which are pictured the half-page mats issued bi-monthly and the weekly mat service in connection with Paramount Press.

A whole page is devoted to the electro plate service, each plate containing eight illustrations and stories of four forthcoming releases. Another page is devoted to the Paramount-Burton Holmes Travel Pictures Bulletin.

Many pages are devoted to the cuts of the stars in coarse and fine screen, single column, thumb nail and circular star cuts. These can be used in newspapers and in magazines, house organs and programs. The cuts of the stars are those of Marguerite Clark, Fanny Ward, Constance Collier, Lenore Ulrich, Dustin Farnum, Elsie Janis, Mary Pickford, Myrtle Stedman, John Barrymore, Pauline Frederick, George Beban, Cleo Ridgely, Mae Murray, Wallace Reid, Marjorie Daw, Marie Doro, Victor Moore, Theodore Roberts, Anita King, Charlotte Walker, Blanche Sweet, Hazel Dawn, Geraldine Farrar, Peggy Hyland, Vivian Martin, Ann Pennington, Winifred Kingston, Donald Brian, Louise Huff, Lou-Tellegen, Edna Goodrich, Kathlyn Williams and Sessue Hayakawa.

Cuts are also distributed in connection with the short reel subjects included in which are the trademarks of Burton Holmes, pictures of Col. Heeza Liar, Farmer AlFalfa, Miss Nanny Goat, Master Bobby Bumps, the Police Dog and the trademarks of the Bray-Gilbert silhouette comedies.

Other pages in the catalogue are devoted to the cuts of scenes from the different productions, the advantage of Picture Progress, the new style of high class heralds, the 22x28 portrait enlargements of the stars for lobby display, what music is supplied with each production, the attractive star and short reel slides and a great assortment of advertising cuts for newspapers, magazines, house organs and programs, together with all sizes of trademarks for letter heads, newspaper work and window cards.

The new designed one and twenty-four sheets are also shown in colors, while to all exhibitors animated trademarks are also offered.

Cleo Madison is being featured at Universal City in a new five-reel production, "The Reward of the Faithless."

WHAT'S THE BEST WAY TO BOOK?

President of the World Film Corporation Discusses Advantages of Open Booking and Program Plans for Exhibitors

By William A. Brady.

I perceive that the great majority of exhibitors very sensibly retain their faith in the program. The exhibitor who goes in for these big star features will inevitably find his expenses getting away from him. Further, he will be building up a demand among his customers which he cannot meet when the supply runs short, as it surely must. Those who stick to the program can afford to wait for the other fellow to blow up.

The exhibitors should bear in mind the indisputable fact that not all the big special features are successful.

All the advertising in the world will not force a picture when the public doesn't want it, no matter how pretentious or costly it may be. It is further true that a great star in a bad picture is a very unprofitable investment.

There are other phases of the present situation which are worthy of consideration. One of these which comes up constantly is expressed by the owner of a chain of theaters: "If we knew positively that certain stars would remain on certain programs, then we could go out and select our program and feel assured that we would get these stars by signing up with certain producers."

This is a situation that will be adjusted when manufacturers place themselves in a position to announce their product for a considerable time in advance. Please do not think I am criticizing any of our competitors. This is not the idea, for a moment.

Among the ideas I have had in mind was the completion of World releases so far ahead that the exhibitor could rest perfectly easy as to what he was to get and when he was to get it. More than this, he was to be so placed that he would take plenty of time in announcing his program, thus instilling absolute confidence in his patrons.

From my own point of view this is entirely satisfactory as a solution of the open booking problem which has been assembling itself for many months. No exhibitor can consistently give up the World program on the ground that he does not know what he is going to receive for a reasonable time in the future as to both plays and stars—for the plays and stars are on the spot.

Unusual V. Releases on General

"The New Porter," a one-reel comedy, opens Vitagraph General film releases for the week of October 30. This is followed by a funny one-reeler, "The Game That Failed," which stars Mary Anderson, listed for November 3. On Saturday, November 4, a three-part Broadway Star feature, "The Heart of a Fool," takes its place. Harry Davenport, who directed this production, also plays the leading role and is ably supported by Mary Maurice, Belle Bruce, Kalman Matus and Lee Lenering.

"The Witching Hour" will be in seven reels and will be the next state right release of the Frohman Amusement Corporation. It was given a trade showing the last week in October.

Fox to Produce Comedies

HENRY R. LEHRMANN WILL HAVE CHARGE OF LAUGH PROVOKERS

Juanita Hansen, a ray of Fox screenshine.

WILLIAM FOX has made a thorough canvass of the field and has decided to produce comedies in addition to his other photo-dramas. Details of this new branch of production have been carefully mapped out and the project will be developed rapidly. The comedies will be released to exhibitors on the regular Fox program. Henry R. Lehrmann, former president and supervising director of the L-Ko Comedies, has already gone to Los Angeles to negotiate with actors, directors and a large corps of technical workers for this purpose. He left for the West Coast immediately after a protracted conference with Mr. Fox and General Manager W. R. Sheehan.

Mr. Fox intends that this important addition to his organization shall become as strong immediately upon its inception, as the firmly based dramatic release each week. To this end, Mr. Lehrmann has been instructed to engage scores of the silent drama's best known and most capable photoplayers in the laugh-making films.

"I can assure exhibitors and motion picturegoers everywhere," Mr. Fox said, "that the comedies will set a new mark in the field. Each of the manuscripts which I have already selected for screening is literally a mine of laughs, and I will not release a single comedy which does not show clearly that it is an uproarious success."

Mr. Lehrmann himself is a noted figure in the photoplay. He began his screen career as an extra with one of the pioneer companies in the new art and soon rose to a directorship with Kinemacolor. With two companions, he organized the L-Ko Company.

He has written dozens of scenarios. A few of his productions are "Love and Surgery," "September Morn," and "After a Million."

Fox's November Releases

Gladys Brockwell in a tensely dramatic photoplay of Alaska, in which she plays the role of a drink-besotted mother and her innocent young daughter; George Walsh in an entertaining picture of the West, with a story that is "different"; and Valeska Suratt as a heartless, scheming woman, who leads two men to ruin. These are William Fox's releases for the first three weeks in November.

Miss Brockwell's first starring vehicle is released for November 6, under title of "Sins of her Parent." Frank Lloyd directed the production. The cast includes William Clifford, who had a stage career of eighteen years with Mantell, Whiteside, Mildred Holland and other footlight favorites; Carl Von Schiller, George Webb, Herschel Mayall and Jim Farley.

One of the sets in the photoplay represents a big art gallery, and is hung with paintings worth thousands of dollars. Another depicts a great Nome lodge.

George Walsh's new photoplay, "The Mediator," has been picturized by Director Otis Turner for William Fox, from Roy Norton's book.

The story concerns Lish Hanley, persistent pacifist—so persistent, in fact, that he spends his whole life battling others in the name of peace.

Most of the exterior work for this production was done in the Sierras and the "locations" are unusually fine.

The quaint humor and the novel theme of the picture stamp "The Mediator" one of William Fox's best releases. It will be shown on November 13.

On November 20, Mr. Fox will release "Jealousy," a powerful photodrama with the sirenic Valeska Suratt in the chief role. The supporting cast includes Walter Law, Charline Mayfield, Abraham Lincoln's grandniece, and Curtis Benton and Joseph Granby.

Miss Suratt's new screen play has for its basis a discontented woman who tries to find happiness by forcing men to love her; but she is crushed and helpless in the end.

Farnum Returns to "Straight" Part

After a prolonged vacation at the Catalina Islands, off the California coast, William Farnum has begun work in a photoplay carrying a dramatic indictment of child labor.

The picture marks the return of Mr. Farnum to a

June Caprice in overalls and "The Ragged Princess."

"straight" part, and the William Fox star will prove still again the versatility and finish of his acting.

Farnum is cast in the production for the part of an United States senator. The photoplay has an "unhappy ending," which serves to make sharper the tragedy of it all.

Incidentally, this will be the first time in almost a year that the actor has not worked under the direction of Oscar C. Apfel. Mr. Apfel has screened nine Farnum productions for William Fox. He is now filming a photodrama with Gladys Brockwell in the leading role.

Frank Lloyd, who had charge of screening "Sins of Her Parents," Gladys Brockwell's first starring vehicle, released for November 6, will direct the forthcoming Farnum picture.

The chief members of Mr. Farnum's supporting cast will be Vivian Rich, Frank Clark, Brooklyn Keller, Charles Clary, Ray Hanford and Gordon Griffith. With the exception of Mr. Keller, who appeared in "Fires of Conscience," these photoplayers are all new to William Fox production.

Miss Rich, who has the role opposite Mr. Farnum, was born in the South and toured in stock so successfully that she received an engagement with the Broadway company of "The Country Girl." Then she joined the original Nestor Company, and later the American.

Frank Clark acted for nineteen years in all parts of the world. He was a theatrical manager in Australia for many seasons and managed, also, several theaters for Klaw & Erlanger. Before coming to the Fox forces, Mr. Clark was with Selig for several years.

Charles Clary has been in the supporting cast of Mary Mannering, Mrs. Leslie Carter and Ralph Stuart. Ray Hanford is an experienced photoplayer, and Gordon Griffith, aged nine, was born on the same day as William Farnum—July 4—but some years later. When Gordon was five years old he had acted in every large city in the United States and Canada.

Statement by Carl Laemmle

A certain New York publication, in its issue of October 14, published a story headed "Laemmle to Start New Film Company, Is Report." "I have no idea where the paper secured all the misinformation contained in the article in question, but it would be difficult to pack more misstatements in a few paragraphs than was done in this case," says Carl Laemmle.

"It is totally untrue that I have any idea of heading any other organization.

"It is totally untrue that the Spreckles sugar interests hold or have any interest in even a single share of Universal stock. Practically all of the Universal stock is owned by Mr. Powers, Mr. R. H. Cochrane and myself, with the exception of a few scattering shares among our close friends. Never has an outside dollar of capital been put into the company. The Universal's earnings have paid for all of its improvements and extensions all over the civilized world.

"It is totally untrue that our Fort Lee studio has caused trouble of any kind. Our plant at Universal City has been enlarged and systematized in such a way that it is much easier and less expensive to make pictures there than at Fort Lee. There was a time when the Fort Lee studio was absolutely essential to us. We are still using it, but only for one or two producing companies. It is totally untrue that we used only two or three scenes made at the coast for our submarine picture, 'Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea.' I have not counted the scenes used, of course, but the picture would be far from complete without them.

"In fact the story is untrue from start to finish."

MUTUAL AFTER LOCAL COLOR

Six Companies Working Outside the Studio on Photoplays to Be Released by Mutual in Next Few Months

In its search for just the right backgrounds and locations to give the necessary local color to its productions the Mutual Film Corporation has six companies working outside the studios.

The slums of Los Angeles have taken the Mary Miles Minter company now working on "A Dream or Two Ago." Supporting Miss Minter appear Lizette Thorne, Gertrude Le Brandt, William Carroll, Orral Humphrey and Dodo Newton.

Helen Holmes and her company under the direction of James P. McGowan, have established themselves at Portal, the southern gateway of the Yosemite National Park, and are taking scenes in "The Lass of the Lumberlands.

Margarita Fischer and her company, consisting of Beatrice Van, Jack Mower, Joseph Harris, J. Gordon Russell and John Steppling, have been at the Catalina Islands picturing "Miss Jackie of the Navy."

C. William Kolb and Max Dill are in a small village producing "Lonesome Town." They are accompanied by May Cloy, Harvey Clarke, Eugenie Ford, Charles F. Spencer, Harry Edmondson, Burdell Jacobs and Dad Spencer.

William Russell plays the role of an Indian in "Lone Star." Director Edward Sloman will soon take Mr. Russell and his company, Charlotte Burton, Harry Von Meter and Alan Forrest to one of the western Indian reservations.

Most of the outdoor cowboy "stuff" for "Immediate Lee," the big Mutual Star Production including Frank Borzage, Anna Little, Chick Morrison and Jack Richardson, was taken in the hills away from Santa Barbara.

Richard Bennett is now busy on "The Law Makers," for which an exact replica of Sing Sing prison has been erected at the studio.

Exchange Manager Entertains

D. B. Lederman, manager of the Laemmle Film Service of Des Moines, recently inaugurated something new when he entertained the thirty members of his force at his country home one evening. The employes of the various departments were called on to make up a program, with the result that everybody got to know everybody else.

"These gatherings make the employes feel better toward each other and toward the Laemmle Film Service," said Mr. Lederman, "and are great affairs. I have been planning for some time to hold a function of this kind and now that the first one is over and is such a success you may be sure that others will follow in due time."

Director Henry McRae has completed "The Pardon," prepared for the screen by William Parker of the Universal staff and featuring J. Warren Kerrigan with Edith Johnson playing opposite.

The Photoplay Scenario

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT

Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

NOTE—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of MOTOGRAPHY, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

Adaptations for the Screen

BY GILSON WILLETS

Staff Writer the Selig Polyscope Company.

MANY who have achieved more or less success in writing photoplay plots have a burning ambition to become staff writers. It is often not an enviable position. For a stated weekly stipend one must often grind into scenario form the ideas purchased from others and endeavor to make a good story whether the idea appeals or not. Another item that frequently falls to the lot of the staff writer is the writing of adaptations for the screen taken from novels. This work is very difficult; the writer first must read the book several times so that the stronger situations and the plot will be letter perfect. Then he must cut down the number of characters as much as possible, retain all the tense and familiar situations, and prepare the material for the screen. In the past many film adapters have taken liberties with a book story. Today the instructions are to follow the text of the book as closely as possible.

I really believe that this is the day of the free-lance writer rather than for the staff writer. If the free-lance writer has success with his plots he can sometimes earn twice as much money within a month as can the writer on weekly stipend. Film manufacturers are more and more searching the highways and byways for talent, for the regular staff writer very frequently will get into a rut.

Titles are important. Make the titles of your photoplays as attractive and comprehensive as possible without divulging the plot. The sub-titles are also of prime importance. They should be grammatical, should be catchy, but authors should try and avoid fine writing, so-called. Sub-titles written fancifully frequently appeal to the audiences as authors' egotism instead of enhancing the meaning of the play. Sub-titles should also be as few as possible.

What it Means to Be a Staff Writer

THE free-lance writer who is always sighing for the scenario editor's chair and the tyros who are working with the one aim in view of some day becoming scenario writer for one of the big film companies would better pause in their headlong flight long enough to buy a copy of the November issue of the Cosmopolitan and read the article entitled "The Madhouse of the Films," by Charles E. Van Loan.

The ravings of the staff scenario writer in this story may give you a deeper insight into the inside of the business with all the sugar coating washed off than any article you have heretofore read giving information on this subject.

In describing an order delivered for a three-reel play to be written around an old character actor the scenaroist says:

All in the world that this old gentleman wanted in his three-reeler was an original romance with plenty of action, a sword-fight or two, a compelling love-interest, a little snappy comedy for contrast, an opportunity to "wear clothes," a good part for a vampire of his acquaintance, and a strong kick at the finish. Outside of these things he required practically nothing, but later commanded me to give him big moments.

The overwrought film company writer also complains that he is forced to live with his work day and night, for the people with whom he comes in contact will not allow him to forget it:

Every man I meet—yes, and every woman, too—has a great idea for my incubator. The boy who polishes my shoes in the morning knows more about scribbling for the screen than I do, and cheerfully rubs the dauber over my pale hosiery while telling me so. I once had a favorite waiter at the Athletic Club, but we are strangers now. In an unguarded moment I allowed him to overhear some conversation which suggested my profession—and since then he has been not only impossible but improbable. I trim my nails with the buttonhole scissors in order to escape the manicure lady who knows how film comedies should be trimmed, and as to the actual writing of scenarios, I am painfully convinced that everybody is doing it, doing it, even my barber—and soon I shall have to cut my own hair.

This writer of photoplays gives an apt description of what the staff writer really does:

And now what is this queer bird known as the staff scenario writer? What are his duties, if any, his simple pleasures, and his deep, corroding griefs? Where does he get on, how far does he ride, and where does he transfer?

The first question is easily answered. The staff scenario writer is the goat for everything and everybody. Nobody loves him; nobody trusts him. The only thing they give him ungrudgingly is blame. He is looked upon with disfavor by bad, bad actors and pert extra girls. He is frowned upon by auditors, because his labor cannot be measured by time-clocks. He is shunned by haughty directors who, many a time and oft, have dragged their lean flanks over the cinder routes of circus and burlesque. He is paid less than a very bad actor, less than one-third the salary of the average director, and all that anyone expects of him is that he shall have always on tap a flow of brilliant and original ideas, suitable for any emergency.

It is in a chill rain of conflicting opinions, demands, suggestions, and condemnations that the staff scenario writer labors night and day to keep directors busy. An idle director means an idle company, with salaries going everlastingly on, consequently a great waste of money.

A first-chop scenario writer can easily turn out an average of two reels a week, original story, continuity, and all. In a pinch he can, and often does, turn out a five-reeler in a week. But so haphazard is the connection between writer and producer, that sixty or seventy reels a year is a very good record. Of course I speak now of writers and companies whose concern is quantity and not quality.

A reel, that is to say a thousand feet of film, will be divided into anywhere from thirty-five to ninety scenes. Comedies demand quick action and run more scenes per reel than dramas, where everything depends upon the acting in the various "big scenes." The complete story of a picture recently produced may be told in three concise sentences, yet the idea was elaborated into seven reels—nearly two hours in the telling on a screen.

The author whose one dream is to become a staff writer so that his work will appear on the screen just as he wrote it and not entirely revised in the producing, will also suffer the explosion of this fond idea.

You probably suppose that when the camera man starts turning the crank on a finished scenario, the staff writer's troubles are over. The other evening I dropped into a theater to see a certain piece of work which I rather fancied. It was a snappy story, with plenty of action; still, its strength, as I saw it, depended upon the human qualities of the characters portrayed. It was my vague idea that my brain-creatures should act like real folks, not like manikins shoved here and there to meet the exigencies of a lifeless plot.

Alas the director had considered that all characters should be one thing or the other! He couldn't understand that a hero might be weak, even for the merest fraction of a second. And he utterly refused to believe that a villain might have a good streak in him, be it ever so thin.

So the story wasn't really mine, after all. My name was on the announcement, and I bowed my head in shame that my friends should believe me the creator of such improbable people.

Although this story is written in a facetious strain it contains more truth than fiction, and the writer whose one idea has been that once he "made the film company" all would be a bed of roses will do well to read deep and cull the unvarnished truths contained herein.

World Contest Announced January 1

THE $5,000 prize scenario contest of the World Film Corporation closed September 15, and the formal announcement of the winning authors will be made January 1, 1917. The interval will be none too long for the task of weighing the values of the manuscripts not already disposed of, as the number of plays and stories submitted in response to Mr. Brady's invitation has been enormous.

The merely mechanical operation of keeping track of these and returning to the owners the material found to be unsuitable at the first reading has required the constant attention of a large clerical force, and the gradual sifting down of the contributions which passed the initial tests has been an undertaking of ever-increasing exactions.

"In the final roundup," said Director General William A. Brady, "there will be nineteen accepted manuscripts, the one considered best among these taking the first prize of $1,000; the second best $750; the third $650; fourth $500; fifth $400; sixth $300; seventh $200; next twelve $100 apiece.

"To handle such a contest at all is what a slangy person might describe as 'some job.' To do it without giving offense in some instances is an utter impossibility, for, alas, there is no such thing as convincing the authors of some rejected manuscripts that they are not immeasurably superior to the ones which have passed muster.

"There are endless reasons why a really meritorious work may be unsuitable for production, but of course we cannot go into these in every instance where we return a play or story. If we were to try we should not be through with the tailings of this contest during the next two or three years.

"So we must be content to do our level best with the likelihood that some of the nineteen prize winners will think our judgment was all right, while several thousands of those whose writings failed to pass will be convinced to the contrary entirely beyond argument.

"I will say at this time that I believe we have uncovered a good deal of real talent during the progress of the contest. We shall benefit from this not alone in the material we receive directly for our various awards but from the very considerable number of unsuccessful aspirants whose contributions showed aptitude sufficient to warrant me in encouraging them to further effort.

"I certainly hope so, for good material is scarce and becoming scarcer. The growing volume of productions makes this a serious matter for those of us who look ahead. The stage plays are rapidly being exhausted and we will soon be compelled to dig deep for fresh sources of supply.

"Conducting one of these contests is a hard road to travel, but if it leads anywhere I shall be ready to start all over again whenever the destination looks at all productive."

"Fall of a Nation" Actors at Theaters

Herman Pollak, manager of the Webster Theater and Airdome in the Bronx, opened that house with "The Fall of a Nation," and in addition had the flesh and blood principals of the film appear on the stage. Percy Standing and the Misses Flora MacDonald, Lorraine Huling and Lelia Frost appeared and were greeted with cheers and fairly inundated with boquets of flowers.

The recent success of feminine agents in handling theatrical matters in France has prompted Thomas Dixon to appoint Flora MacDonald as the traveling representative of "The Fall of a Nation" in that country. Miss MacDonald sailed on Saturday, September 30. Contracts for the French exhibition of the spectacle are made on this side of the water, so that her work will be chiefly to supervise French productions.

One hundred and fifty days of "The Fall of a Nation" have already been booked by the greater Vitagraph in this country. At several of the exchanges private presentations with elaborate musical features are given to exhibitors.

Cavalieri Film Record Maker

That the box office angle is sometimes lost sight of by the newspaper reviewers of a picture is shown by the success of Pathe's "The Shadow of Her Past," in which Lina Cavalieri and Lucien Muratore are starred. The fact that the picture was made abroad overshadowed in the reviewers' minds the wonderful drawing value of Cavalieri, "the most beautiful woman in the world." Exhibitors, however, seeing the opportunity for effective advertising, played "The Shadow of Her Past" up strong and then reaped a harvest. Bookings of three and four days were lengthened to a week. The result was that many a house record was broken and the exhibitors reaped and are reaping a harvest.

Book for Film Salesmen

M. H. Hoffman, general manager of Bluebird Photoplays, has just gotten out a very neat and valuable blue booklet as an aid to Bluebird salesmen. The whole subject of selling films, particularly Bluebirds is treated in an analytical and exhaustive manner. The booklet marks a distinct step in advance in the industry along solid business lines.

"Patria" Ready for December Fourth

INTERNATIONAL PRESENTS THIRD GOLDEN EAGLE FEATURE

THE International Film Service announces that "Patria," the preparedness serial with Mrs. Vernon Castle in the title role, will be released on December 4. This serial has been many months in the making and was conceived for the dual purpose of furnishing photoplay entertainment and instilling into the American public the deep obligation of preparing the country against invasion. Louis Joseph Vance is the author of the play. Mrs. Castle won her fame as a dancer, but there is no doubt but that the part she plays in this serial and the way she enacts it will bring her renown as an actress. Others having important roles in this production are Milton Sills, Warner Oland and Dorothy Green.

"The Ocean Waif" is the title of the third Golden Eagle feature, a five-reel drama, to be released on November 2. Like "Jaffery" and "The Flower of Faith," this is a clean, wholesome drama, devoid of sensationalism but of absorbing interest. Carlyle Blackwell and Doris Kenyon are co-stars in this production. Others in the cast are Fraunie Fraunholz, William Morse, Lyn Donaldson, Auguste Bermwister and Edgar Norton.

Magazine to Advertise "Patria"

With the daily newspapers being extensively used as advertising mediums for the productions of the film companies the International Film Service has gone a step farther and will use monthly magazine advertising to exploit its serial "Patria." This company has just signed a contract for a two-page spread in the December issue of the Cosmopolitan, and the entire space will be used to tell of the wonders of the film. It is also probable that other monthly magazines will be utilized in this campaign.

Magazine advertising, however, will be only a small part of the gigantic campaign for "Patria." The motion picture trade publications will be used more extensively than ever and the leading newspapers in practically every large city will carry "Patria" advertisements. There will be no extensive billboard campaign, with the exception of the usual "paper" for use of the theaters where "Patria" is being presented, the International going on the theory that the publishers are entitled to all the money to be spent for advertising.

Vernon Castle Decorated

"Somewhere in France" is Vernon Castle, now an ensign in the British Royal Aviation Corps. Mrs. Castle is immensely proud of her husband's achievements and was very happy over receiving a letter last week in which he said he was to be honored by the French government.

Vernon Castle's division of aviators is now attached to the French army of General Foch. On October 3 the New York dancer led a flight of seven monoplanes over the German lines, located Genermont and the Boville farms, for the French artillery and brought back his aviators without an accident. As a result of the work of the American aviator, the French captured several salients, for which he will be decorated by the French government.

"Some persons imagined that Mr. Castle entered the aviation corps for publicity purposes," said Mrs. Castle. "I hope they have changed their minds. He is as brave and daring a man as there is in the British army and is daily risking his life for the cause he believes to be just."

The remarkable impression which "The Flower of Faith" made upon the people of Atlanta, Georgia, is shown in the telegram which the International Film Service received from George E. Schmidt, manager of Alamo No. 2 in that city.

"'The Flower of Faith,' with car strike and Ringling circus as opposition, jammed Alamo No. 2 with the chain up, during its engagement. Comments from our patrons gloriously enthusiastic, particularly on the wonderful night riding scenes of the avengers, which many say surpass those shown in 'The Birth of a Nation.' We have booked all Golden Eagles on our circuit and will so continue, with 'Jaffery' and 'The Flower of Faith' so strongly indicating your intentions."

The management of the Victoria Theater, Wilmington, Delaware, gave a private showing of International's Golden Eagle feature, "The Flower of Faith," to clergymen and educators of that city. The clergy was tremendously impressed by the film and a number of the ministers announced that they would preach special sermons on the picture. Following the invitation entertainment the Victoria management booked the play for a four-day run.

Dan Horgan Appointed Boston Manager

Following its established custom of advancing employes who display ability, the International has appointed Dan Horgan manager of the Boston branch of the International Film Service, succeeding Former Manager F. H. Vine.

Mr. Horgan was born and reared in Boston and has been connected with the film industry the past two years, first as roadman for Pathe, later going with the International when they opened their Boston office. He is well and favorably known among the New England exhibitors.

Two new salesmen have also been added to the Boston office. E. L. Knight, for several years manager of the Bijou Theater, Springfield, will cover the territory formerly handled by Mr. Horgan; and S. P. Levenburg, formerly of the Unicorn, has been assigned to Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont territory that has heretofore been covered by W. S. Davidson, who is transferred to Rhode Island, Boston and vicinity and the Cape.

First Talmadge Play Chosen

SELZNICK-PICTURES TO PRESENT YOUNG STAR IN "PANTHEA"

THEATER goers will remember that some time ago Mme. Olga Petrova presented on the stage "Panthea," a powerful drama which also attracted much attention in Europe. This play has been chosen as the vehicle for Norma Talmadge in the first of her Selznick-Pictures productions.

It had been announced that Miss Talmadge would be presented at the head of her own producing company in a film version of David Graham Phillips' novel, "The Price She Paid," but Joseph M. Schenck, president of the Norma Talmadge Film Corporation, succeeded last week in obtaining motion picture rights to "Panthea" and at once decided to use this powerful drama for his initial presentation of the popular young film star.

In "Panthea" Miss Talmadge will be presented in a role different from anything she has heretofore attempted but one that she is entirely qualified to portray with brilliant success. The story of Panthea, while tragic, is of such intense dramatic character as to provide exceptionally fine screen material and under the direction of Allan Dwan it is expected that Miss Talmadge will make the greatest success of her career in this production. The play from which this story has been taken was written by Monckton Hoffe and after being produced on the continent, proved one of the dramatic sensations of the decade.

"The Price She Paid" to Follow

The rights to "The Price She Paid" were purchased by Lewis J. Selznick from the Phillips' estate for Miss Talmadge and this story will probably be her second Selznick-Pictures production.

Miss Talmadge has already begun work on "Panthea." Director Dwan has engaged the greater part of the cast. The story lends itself to exceptionally magnificent scenic settings and all the characters are of strong distinctive types that go far towards making any motion picture a success.

Miss Talmadge, the star, has been one of the most successful Triangle players during the past year. None of the younger directors in the motion picture industry has attained a more enviable reputation than Allan Dwan, who will have complete charge of all of Miss Talmadge's future productions. Mr. Dwan is responsible for some of the finest examples of the film and during the past year added greatly to his prestige by being the director of four of the most successful Douglas Fairbanks pictures, namely; "Manhattan Madness," "The Habit of Happiness," "The Half Breed," and "The Good Bad Man." Mr. Dwan directed Miss Talmadge in her most recent success, "Fifty-Fifty."

That the so-called "silent drama" will never attain its highest form of expression until all wording matter is eliminated from the screen is the belief of Clara Kimball Young. And her most recent production, "The Common Law," set a record for the lowest number of "titles" ever used in a seven-reel picture.

According to Miss Young, the use of titles is rapidly dying out and her greatest ambition is to produce the first real "silent drama" in which the only wording matter shown on the screen would be the cast of characters.

"The best example of what a perfect motion picture should be," said Miss Young in a recent interview, "is the French pantomime now playing at the Booth Theater, 'Pierrot the Prodigal.' As I watched the performance of this unique creation I was impressed immediately with its message as to the possibilities of the photoplay. I left the theater determined not to rest until I find a scenario which can be presented upon the screen as 'Pierrot' is upon the stage, in a consecutive, unbroken story, so clear in its action that there need not be a single caption or title or explanatory note." The tendency of late has been rather to increase the subtitles and Miss Young's experiment will be watched with interest.

Vitagraph Offers "The Last Man"

EDITH STOREY AND ANTONIO MORENO FEATURED IN SEVEN PRODUCTIONS

IF the employes of the Greater Vitagraph Company are any judges, "The Last Man," adapted from James Oliver Curwood's story, may be classed as a super-feature. In keeping with its policy of submitting its program releases to the critical eyes of its employes, "The Last Man" was projected in the exhibiting room of the home office and all reports were most enthusiastic. "Mary Sunshine" Anderson and William Duncan are the co-stars in this Vitagraph Blue Ribbon feature which will be released on the regular program on October 30. Corine Griffith, Jack Mower and Otto Lederer complete the cast of principals.

From Vitagraph's Western Studio

Antonio Moreno has now joined Edith Storey at the Western Vitagraph studios and they are engaged in producing the super-feature, "Money Madness," from the book by Hamlin Garland. This production is to be followed by six others equally as big in theme and treatment, adaptations from famous books and stories. Under the direction of William Wolbert they will produce "Aladdin from Broadway," from the book by Fred Isham; "Captain Sunlight," from the novelette by Cyrus Townsend Brady; "The Captain of the Gray Horse Troop," by Paul West; "Cavanaugh, the Forest Ranger," by Hamlin Garland; "The Magnificent Meddler," from the original scenario by Lawrence McCluskey, and "The King of Diamonds," from the story by Edward L. Ballou.

The Western Vitagraph players will be entirely at the disposal of Director Wolbert for the selection of his casts to support Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno. William Duncan will be cast in important roles, as will Mary Anderson, Otto Lederer, George Holt, George Kunkel and Jack Moore.

In addition to these large productions, Director David Smith will continue to turn out single reel comedies and Broadway star features.

New Brand Name for V Comedies

Beginning Monday, November 13, the Vitagraph Company will release each week through the V-L-S-E organization a one-reel comedy, to be known as a "Vitagraph Big V Comedy."

These Big V comedies will feature Hughie Mack, Patsy deForest and their company of convulsing comedians. The selection of this brand name as a better title than "The Hughie Mack Comedies," the name by which they have heretofore been known, was the result of a contest participated in by all the members of the Vitagraph family. It is quite probable that other comedians of co-ordinate drawing power with Hughie Mack will from time to time be presented in these films. These comedies will be written by Graham Baker and Lawrence Semon and directed by Mr. Semon.

The Big V comedies will be a regular part of the Greater Vitagraph program from November 13 on. There is to be nothing spasmodic about the release of these films; exhibitors may count upon a comedy being available each week.

These productions will have a novel, animated title piece and illustrated sub-titles, both of which will add much to their distinctiveness. They will be completed far in advance of their release dates, so as to avoid any diminution in the standard by reason of rush work. The first ten Big V comedies in the order of their release are as follows:

"Walls and Wallops," "Jumps and Jealousy," "His Conscious Conscience," "Hash and Havoc," "Rah, Rah, Rah," "Help! Help! Help!" "Shanks and Chivalry," "Speed and Spunk," "Bullies and Bullets," "Jolts and Jealousy."

Vitagraph Secures "The Desired Woman"

Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady, in charge of Vitagraph's scenario department, has purchased through Edwin Selwyn the film rights to Will M. Harben's book, "The Desired Woman." This is the novel that sold through several editions, and it is believed it will make a splendid motion drama. "The Desired Woman" is one of a great many important scripts acquired by the Vitagraph Company within the past few weeks.

Griffith Makes Political One-Reeler

As a testimonial to Governor Whitman, who last spring vetoed the Christman-Wheeler motion picture censorship bill, which would have worked serious hardships on producers, distributers and exhibitors in New York State, David W. Griffith at his own expense and gratis, has produced a one-reel film entitled "A Day With Governor Whitman." Many of the big motion picture producing and distributing companies have united to take care of the making of one hundred prints and their distribution throughout the state.

It is the purpose of the movement on the part of the motion picture industry represented in New York state that every exhibitor in the state, numbering about 2,000, should have an opportunity between now and Election Day to show the Griffith picture on his screen one or more days. The presidents of the big distributing companies have notified their exchanges to obtain prints of sufficient number to efficiently cover requests from exhibitors on their books. Fifty one-sheet posters will accompany each print sent to exchanges to be given away free to the exhibitors using the picture.

In the organization of the plan for printing and distributing the following film companies, in addition to others, gave their unqualified support and enthusiastic co-operation, including Metro Pictures Corporation, Eclipse Studio, on behalf of Jules Brulatour; International Film Company, Pathe, Paramount Pictures Corporation, Famous Players Film Company, Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company, Pallas Pictures, Triangle, Universal, Mutual, World, Fox, V-L-S-E and General Film Companies.

In a forthcoming Triangle-Fine Arts release, "The Feud Breakers," Dorothy Gish plays the part of a mountain girl in the Cumberland Mountains in those old days when moonshining was flourishing.

DISTRIBUTION OF FILMS

I. E. Chadwick of the Ivan Film Productions, Inc., Discusses the Improper Distribution of Motion Pictures

I. E. Chadwick, of the Ivan Film Productions, Inc., made the following statement to a MOTOGRAPHY reporter on the question of the proper distribution of motion picture films:

"A wealth of artistry, of effort, yea, of money, is often expended in a photoplay, and the result is a thing of beauty and uplifting. Then what happens? Is this play then placed in the hands of the most capable man available, that it may secure the widest and most fitting circulation for the edification of the public? Is the life of this play preserved to its last? Alas, in ever so many cases it is not. In marketing every other product, prime consideration is given to the personality, experience and efficiency of the proposed distributor; in marketing photoplays sole consideration appears to be given to the capital plus effrontery of the proposed distributor. Experience and knowledge appear to be at a discount.

"This condition is no small factor in the premature demise of many a worthy photoplay. In the theatrical field great care is taken that proper and efficient methods prevail when exploiting a production, to the end that every atom of the living breath thereof reaches the public. Sad to say, the extensive rather than the intensive system of marketing photoplays is employed with the usual results. The path of least resistance is too often followed. There comes to mind the difference in efficiency as exemplified by the capable experienced theatrical producer who will keep his production out of New York City until the proper theater for its adequate presentation is available; and the grab-quick distributor who permits the first showing in the metropolis of a beautiful photo production in a 300-seat nickelodeon on Fourteenth street for one day only.

"Fortunately, and despite this fearful handicap, the industry is passing through its period of transformation with its head up. This evil, with others, will be eradicated, although at a fearful cost. Realization that the mere possession of money cannot make a successful producer or distributor is rapidly taking root. Unscientific inefficiency will give place to knowledge and experience. Effrontery and brazenry will no longer prove the open sesame to place and pelf.

"Having this in view, I never sought, when distribution of Ivan filmplays was arranged, to secure merely the highest bidder for the productions. Instead, the minimum amount, that sound business and results sought demanded, was fixed, and of all the applicants for local distribution in a particular field or territory, preference was given to the distributor of established reputation, as a man of integrity and worth, of real experience in his field. The results of this policy have been intensely gratifying. A corps of exchangemen, second in efficiency to none, are engaged in the exploitation of Ivan Films with such success, that the Ivan Film Productions is the only independent producer continuously operating during the past two years without resort to a suspension of activities or a change of policy in its distribution or marketing arrangements. Further, and still more marked, is the fact that the span of life of the filmplay is exceeding greater under this marketing system. This fact is evidenced by the rather remarkable circumstance that the sale of prints, lithographed posters, photographs and heralds on the Ivan subjects a year and more old shows no marked decline at this date. Plays like 'A Mother's Confession,' 'Concealed Truth,' 'A Fool's Paradise,' seem by proper and adequate distribution to have been laved in the font of eternal youth."

Morosco Stages "Accident"

Rushing toward a high cliff at Long Beach, California, an automobile containing Thomas Holding, the popular Morosco-Paramount leading man, and "Daredevil Thompson" plunged over the bluff into the Pacific ocean while several thousand persons looked on during the filming of Oliver Morosco's forthcoming release "Redeeming Love," starring Kathlyn Williams. During the act Thomas Holding appeared quite at ease, and Thompson showed about as much nervousness as the ordinary human would display while reading a Sunday paper on the front porch.

"Forty-five miles an hour is considerably faster than the average man travels through most of the miles of his life—and that bluff was considerably higher than most men ever fall from under any conditions. The car hit the water hard enough to smash everything about it that was readily smashable and the parts that would float did. Both Mr. Holding and 'Daredevil Thompson' are expert swimmers and it seemed that the machine had hardly hit the water when the two just dug their paws into the brine and paddled ashore."

Essanay Films Alaskan Scenery

Into the "Norway of America," the inland water route to Alaska and the last land of romance in North America, Essanay camera men have been forcing their way for the past five months, encountering varied dangers that scenic film might be obtained. Now 20,000 feet of this film, picturing natural beauties in localities never before photographed, has been received at the Essanay laboratories. This will be compressed to half length and issued as ten 500-foot educational films with Wallace A. Carlson's Canimated Nooz Pictorial and other half reel releases.

Director William V. Mong at Universal City is picturizing "In the Days of '49," written by himself.

Artcraft to Handle Headliners

PRESIDENT GREENE TALKS ON NEW DISTRIBUTING ORGANIZATION

Walter E. Greene, president Artcraft.

WALTER E. GREENE, president of Artcraft Pictures Corporation, in outlining the policy of this new distributing organization in the film industry and explaining what its policy would be following the release of Mary Pickford in "Less Than the Dust" on November 6, stated that Artcraft was not formed to handle any one star exclusively, nor the output of any one producer, whatever its quality. The real reason for the formation of this company was "to handle the headliners in motion pictures."

"Artcraft was formed by men who believe that something must be done for the new class of motion picture theater which demands big features for long runs," Mr. Greene continued, "that something must be done for the producer who wants to make masterpieces, unrestricted by the limits of present methods of distribution. Artcraft started with Mary Pickford because she best exemplifies the basic ideas which animated the organizers of Artcraft.

"Everyone admits that Mary Pickford is the 'headliner' of motion picture stars. Her appearance in a theater has the same effect that the appearance of Maude Adams has in a legitimate house or Ethel Barrymore, for instance, in vaudeville. The box office tells the story.

"What our sixteen exchanges in the United States and Canada have done for Mary Pickford and 'Less Than the Dust' they can do for any other production of equal merit. No longer need the ambitious producer pit his masterpiece against a system of territorial distribution or organization of expensive road companies that by their very nature are barred from the motion picture theaters, where the real film fan goes for his amusement.

"Artcraft, then, is prepared to give the producer his real incentive, obtain adequate presentation for his work and pay him sufficiently for it. At the same time the motion picture theater is protected. The new big feature houses are able to obtain the kind of pictures that their policy requires and the smaller theaters may share in the profits by engagements of big productions that have been successful in the long run houses. Together we can keep our masterpieces out of the opera houses and combination theaters. This is the opportunity Artcraft gives to the exhibitor: To have and to hold the best in motion pictures."

Mr. Greene announces that eighty theaters in the United States and Canada will show Mary Pickford in "Less Than the Dust" on November 6. He also intimates that the time is not far distant when Mary Pickford will have a companion in the Artcraft circle.

In her enthusiasm to show some tangible recognition of the hundreds of exhibitors who have revised their policy in order to show the new Pickford productions, Mary Pickford arranged with President Greene to order the free distribution of several thousand 24-sheet stands to the exhibitors who have already booked her new production. These stands are divided between the regular stock printing which the exhibitors are encouraged to use between the various features in the Pickford series and the special production posters prepared from artistic designs for the first release, "Less Than the Dust."

New evidence comes every day to the Artcraft offices to show what a tremendous campaign the Mary Pickford exhibitors are preparing to wage. Wells Hawks, Miss Pickford's personal representative in charge of publicity, is nearing the end of a trip that has covered practically every large city north of Dallas and east of Kansas City. His work with the newspapers is expected to aid the exhibitors greatly.

A month before the announced release date of Mary Pickford's new Artcraft production, "Less Than the Dust," the Chicago manager had booked the picture in 33 theaters for a total of 100 days. Everyone knows that this means at least 400 performances of "Less Than the Dust" in that city. And this "run" is assured a month ahead of its first showing. By the time the engagement actually begins this total will doubtless have assumed staggering proportions. Meanwhile Mary Pickford will be working on a successor to "Less Than the Dust," which she aspires to make even bigger and better than her first production since she became an independent star.

Mollie King with Pathe

One of the latest screen stars engaged for the Pathe Gold Rooster productions is Miss Mollie King, who is featured in "Kick In," which has just been produced by the Astra Film Corporation. Miss King also plays the lead in a serial now being made for Pathe.

Eight months after she made her entrance into the world Mollie King made her entrance on the stage, where she has been ever since. She is now with Astra and Pathe.

"Kick In" is a famous Woods success which will be released in a short time and in which Miss King was co-starred with William Courtney.

Mollie King was born in New York City on April 18th, 1898. She attended the New York public schools, graduating from Wadleigh High School. Her first stage appearance was at the age of eight months and she has been on the stage ever since. She played in several Broadway successes and was a feature at the Winter Garden after a two-year tour of the Orpheum vaudeville circuit, where she and her sister Nellie did a sister act. She has been starred in several of the productions of the World Film Corporation and is well known to the motion picture audience throughout the country.

She is of fair complexion with reddish blonde hair and hazel eyes. She weighs 115 pounds and has a face which, in addition to being beautiful, is so mobile that it can express any emotion that a human countenance can register and still retain its beauty. Miss King can sing and dance charmingly as millions of vaudeville fans throughout the country can attest.

Loving Cup Presented to William Fox

At the premiere showing of his production, "A Daughter of the Gods," at the Lyric Theater, New York, on October 17, William Fox was presented with a Tiffany silver loving cup standing two feet high and handsomely chased and engraved. This was a tribute of esteem and admiration from his studio employes. The inscription upon the cup read: "To William Fox —With best wishes for a world-wide success of 'A Daughter of the Gods' from Valeska Suratt, James Vincent, Max Reynolds, and all studio employes of the Fox Film Corporation, October 17, 1916."

Among those who sent their best wishes for "A Daughter of the Gods" on the opening night were Bertha Kalich, Adolph Zukor, Al. Woods, Victor Herbert, Aaron Hoffman, Perex Huff, William Beeban, W. H. Tooker, A. Toxen Worm, J. J. McCarthy and Alf. T. Wilton.

The actual cost of the picture is said to be in excess of a million dollars. The total number of persons appearing in it runs into the thousands. So enthusiastically has "A Daughter of the Gods" been received in New York that it has become necessary to put the sale of seats on for six weeks in advance at the Lyric Theater. An illustrated review of the spectacle appears on another page in this issue.

Annette Kellermann is going on a road tour, during which she will address clubwomen in various parts of the United States on her experiences as an artiste in the motion picture drama. On her return Miss Kellermann will continue rehearsing on a new production which promises to show more of her versatility as an actress. William Fox will probably star Miss Kellermann next summer in a picture of the same magnitude as "A Daughter of the Gods," but on an entirely different subject.

Two Staffs Making "Lumberlands"

To increase the weekly production of the last ten chapters (twenty reels) of "A Lass of the Lumberlands," being filmed by Miss Helen Holmes and her Signal-Mutual Company in California, Director J. P. McGowan has split his forces into a major and a minor company, the former under himself, the latter under the direction of Paul C. Hurst. While the McGowan staff is making the more important scenes the Hurst staff will make the subordinate ones.

World Releases Young Picture

The World Film Corporation will release a second Clara Kimball Young picture on November 13. Its title is "Without a Soul." It is a picturization of the novel "Lola." This play, which deals with the question of the restoration of human life when it has departed, affords Miss Young a singularly broad range of emotions for portrayal.

Captain Leslie T. Peacock has joined the production forces at Universal City and is filming in one reel a comedy written by himself, "Oh, You Honeymoon." The leads are played by Alida Hayman and Willard Wayne, supported by Ruth Snyder, Eugene Walsh and Ed Brady.

McClure to Supply Demand for Drama

"SEVEN DEADLY SINS" TO BE RELEASED WITHIN FEW WEEKS

WHEN a new producing firm enters the field the motion picture public is always anxious to know what kind of pictures it is going to produce and await with interest the first production to decide whether they will be followers of this brand or place their patronage elsewhere. Fully realizing that success means giving the public just what it wants, the McClure Publications have studied this question and come to the conclusion that motion picture audiences love best of all what other audiences have always loved—the drama.

The answer, then, to the question of where the motion picture is going, where it will ultimately find its greatest field, would seem to be clear. Audiences have voted on what they like best; investigations by mail and from house to house have been made; theater managers from all parts of the country have submitted the results of their personal talks with patrons. The result is nearly always the same. Out of every one hundred people who enter a moving picture theater at least seventy go to see the drama, or feature, as it is called in movie parlance.

Unfortunately the public may find itself thwarted by a commercial condition in its natural demand for dramatic pictures. So many plays have been produced badly that the market is glutted. Moreover, the business has grown so fast that the methods of selling and distributing pictures have not kept pace with either supply or demand. The result of all these conditions is that the producer is forced to sell the productions he has already made at a loss and is driven to unfortunate economies in his future product. Such a course, if continued, will divert the public taste from its legitimate channels and force it to fall back on the slapstick and spectacular.

The door is wide open, then, for the producer who will give the public the picture dramas they want, and who will advertise them so effectively that the exhibitor will feel warranted in featuring his releases.

What McClure Plans to Do

It has remained for a publishing firm, McClure Publications, to do this. This company has now developed its business to include motion-picture productions, under the trade mark, McClure Pictures. These men know, or ought to know, what the public want in the way of entertainment. They know the value of high standards and editorial discrimination and they can apply these qualities as they have not yet been consistently applied to motion pictures. Moreover, they understand the value and technique of advertising, of telling the people the facts they want to know about their productions.

This company having gathered many notable stars under its trademark, is in a position to guarantee to both exhibitor and patron the highest standard of acting by the most successful and popular artists.

A New York dramatic critic who has a weakness for invoking the immortal words of bygone poets once called Ann Murdock "A daughter of the gods, divinely tall, and most divinely fair." You can judge her for yourself when Miss Murdock appears on your screen in "Envy," the first of "The Seven Deadly Sins," the new McClure Pictures series. With the following this charming new star has gained on the stage and with the publicity given her through the McClure publications, the Billieburke-haired Miss Murdock should be popular on the sunshine sheet.

First McClure Production

Its first production is in itself an earnest of the original ideas it will bring into the motion-picture field, for it consists of a series of seven five-reel feature plays, the first series of five-reel plays ever produced.

In this series, "Seven Deadly Sins," the first play, in which Ann Murdock, the Frohman star, is to appear, is called "Envy." The second one, in which Holbrook Blinn is the most important player, is called "Pride." Charlotte Walker is to play "Sloth," Nance O'Neill "Greed," H. B. Warner "Wrath," and so on until all of the Seven Deadly Sins have been portrayed on the screen. The continuity of interest is further strengthened by the appearance in each play of a pair of young lovers played by those sterling young actors, George Le Guere and Shirley Mason. Each play is to be complete in itself and will stand on its own feet, but all seven form a group that can be advertised together.

Motion picture audiences will soon have the chance to decide for themselves whether each McClure picture is to be a superpicture, for McClure expects to release the series within a few weeks.

H. B. Warner Joins McClure

H. B. Warner, well known through his work with the Triangle Film Corporation, has signed a contract to appear in McClure Pictures, and will be the star of "Wrath," one of the five-reel feature divisions of the McClure series, "Seven Deadly Sins." Mr. Warner, who is the son of Charles Warner, the great English actor, scored a success on the stage before he went into the pictures.

Mr. Warner is the fifth eminent star to join the McClure forces. Others working under this banner are Ann Murdock, Holbrook Blinn, Nance O'Neill and Charlotte Walker. Rita Stanwood, Mr. Warner's wife, will play opposite him in "Wrath."

Theodore Marston Directs "Greed"

Having completed his direction of the McClure play, "Sloth," of which Charlotte Walker is the star, Theodore Marston is now directing "Greed," another play of the McClure series, "Seven Deadly Sins," in which Nance O'Neill is starring.

Mr. Marston, in his previous connections with Pathe Freres, Kinemacolor and Vitagraph, was unusually successful in photographing the curb market without having his scenes marred by those curb brokers who take special delight in causing a director trouble.

His experience in such scenes is being utilized by him in the filming of "Greed," in which crowds are depicted pursuing their passion for wealth in the hectic atmosphere of metropolitan financial circles.

"THE CRISIS" HISTORICAL

William N. Selig Tried to Make Production Historically Correct Rather Than to Make a Great Spectacle

William N. Selig in his filming of Winston Churchill's novel "The Crisis," has forgone all effort for the spectacular but has striven instead to preserve for posterity a graphic and historically correct symposium of the stirring events just prior to, and during the Civil War.

"The Crisis" can hardly be termed a war picture—in the strict sense of the word; it does not depict the harrowing details of the battlefield and the incidental suffering which such picturizations generally include—but it does present an inspiring and wholly realistic recital of that portion of American history with which the average American of today is all too little familiar. Interwoven with the grim facts of history is the charming story of the Carvels of Virginia. True, there are battle scenes, but "The Crisis" in picture form, confines itself more to the actual events which led up to the struggle, and of the heart-rending incidents which marked that bitter strife.

If for no other reason, the fact that "The Crisis" serves to present a characterization of the lovable Abraham Lincoln, should mark for its success. George W. Fawcett is the lovable character of Judge Silas Whipple; Nat Snyder is Col. Carvel; Bessie Eyton is the delightful Virginia Carvel; Thomas Santschi is Stephen Brice, "the Yankee"; and there are a host of others, all of whom give remarkably satisfying characterizations.

American history lives again in "The Crisis."

The filming of "The Crisis" was done at the old Carvel homestead just outside of St. Louis, Mo., real negroes being employed to enact the servant roles; the famous Carvel jewels and art were utilized and everything possible done to preserve for posterity an historically correct version of the incidents as they actually occurred. Among the interesting scenes is one showing the town of Freeport, Ill., brilliantly illuminated on the night of the famous Lincoln-Douglas debate. Shortly thereafter the action shows the election of Lincoln to the presidency and the plunging of the nation into the throes of war. Many of the noted battles are realistically reproduced, showing infantry, artillery and naval craft in action, the whole terminating with the fall and capture of Vicksburg. Especially effective are the night scenes depicting the grim battlefields of both the north and the south; the illumination of Vicksburg caused by bursting shells and the actual hand-to-hand encounters staged to add realism to this great picture.

Chicago Reel Fellows Meet

The regular meeting of the Chicago "Reel Fellows' Club" was held at the New Morrison Hotel on October 19. After an elegant dinner the business meeting was called.

A number of new applications for membership were voted upon and accepted. The principal topic under discussion during the evening was the "Reel Fellows'" ball which is to be held at the La Salle Hotel on the evening of November 10. Suggestions were offered by Charles Nixon and R. R. Nehls regarding the best ways and means to induce some of the eastern stars to attend the ball. A special effort will be made to induce Clara Kimball Young and Louis J. Selznick to come to Chicago. It is almost certain that Francis X. Bushman will be present, as he has indicated his intention of being here in a telegram to R. O. Procter. The entertainment committee reported having made arrangements for a good number of high class vaudeville acts as well as a special cabaret, assuring patrons of continued amusement.

"The Crisis" Rights Sold

The rights for Sherman-Elliot's big drama, "The Crisis," have been sold for a number of important territories in the west.

William Sievers of the Grand Central Theaters Company of St. Louis has bought the rights for the state of Missouri. A. B. Cook, A. H. Gross and R. E. Kennington, owners of the States Rights Company of Jackson, Mississippi, have purchased outright the feature for Louisiana, Tennessee and Mississippi and will soon open the production in the larger cities in those states. The rights for California, Nevada and Arizona have been acquired by P. Franklin of San Francisco.

Mary McAlister, the little girl who pleased so many in "Borrowed Sunshine," a two-act Essanay drama, is now at work in another child picture of the same length. It is entitled, "Unto the Least of These."

Four hints at the striking character of "The Witching Hour," Frohman's screen version of the popular stage play featuring Jack Sherrill and other notables.

Frohman Completes "The Witching Hour"

JACK SHERRILL, AUBREY SMITH, MARIE SHOTWELL AND ROBERT CONNESS LEADS

THE Frohman Amusement Corporation's feature "The Witching Hour," is now completed and a trade showing is planned within the next two weeks. The principal roles are enacted by C. Aubrey Smith, Marie Shotwell, Jack Sherrill, Robert Conness, Helen Arnold and Etta De Groff.

"The Witching Hour" as produced by the Frohman enterprise, stands as a dramatic spectacle, in every sense of the word.

The story of the play, as taken by Augustus Thomas from the book "Caleb Powers," was the most intense dramatic production of its day and in stage form was the popular hit of the decade. When Anthony Kelly was commissioned to construct the scenario, he demanded three weeks in which to complete it.

"It is so full of tremendous possibilities that I want to get every angle of the tale and get out of the story every possibility," he said.

When the story was turned over to Director Irving, Mr. Kelly nominated it the best scenario he had ever written.

For the production, Augustus Thomas was conferred with and watched a number of the scenes made, and later projected. So highly pleased was he that arrangements are going forward for the producing of other great Thomas productions by the Frohmans.

Every effort of George Irving was concentrated upon securing dramatic effects.

The wonderful opportunity of bringing out in the character of Clay Whipple, the awful fear he has for the cat's eye pin, the continual torturing of the boy's brain by the gambler, who shows this pin at every opportunity, and finally the mighty scene in which Clay, driven to desperation by the sight of the cat's eye, kills his tormentor, will, according to those who have seen portions of the picture, stand out as the greatest situations ever conceived.

Extremely suspenseful situations, led up to by series of thrilling dramatic moments, punctuate the entire seven reels.

Aubrey Smith as Jack Brookfield, Marie Shotwell as Helen, Robert Conness as Hardmuth and Jack Sherrill as Clay Whipple are burdened with the heavier dramatic work, with the bulk falling to Smith and Miss Shotwell.

The story of "The Witching Hour" contains, in addition to the peculiar theme of the hypnotic influence over a weak-willed boy of a cat's eye pin, worn by a nondescript gambler, three distinct romances. The one, the love of the weak-willed boy for a girl and her instilling in him the power of strength. The other the love of the honorable gambler for the boy's mother and the third the animal love of the district attorney for the same girl as the weak-willed boy—and these three love interests sweep through the picture in veritable waves of emotion.

Twenty-eight principal characters are contained in the play. Seventeen elaborate interior sets, in which every care had to be taken to get just the proper effect —for as it is remembered, the character of Brookfield, in the play, was a complex one. His love for the game, his admiration for the one woman and his great ambition for art, struggled in chaotic contrast—and on the screen are depicted instants never dreamed possible on the spoken stage.

"The Witching Hour" will be state righted by the Frohman Company and will follow the former production "The Conquest of Canaan." It is thought that those who have secured "The Conquest of Canaan" will also have the control of "The Witching Hour," at least, the intention of Mr. Sherrill is to have one outlet in each territory and to develop and create only big productions of more than ordinary interest, at the rate of twelve features a year.

Director Raymond Wells is making rapid progress at Universal City picturizing his own story, "The Little Queen of Nowhere Land," featuring Ruth Stonehouse with Jack Mulhall playing opposite. Wells is using hundreds of people in this production, which was prepared for the screen by Fred Myton of the Universal staff.

NEW EDISON PLAY

Conway Tearle, Francine Larrimore, Mabel Trunnelle and Robert Conness in Edison Five-Reelers for Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay

The announcement that Edison pictures will again be available will be welcome news to thousands of exhibitors. The first picture to be released by Edison through the new Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay combination will be "The Heart of the Hills," which is scheduled for October 30.

The pictures that are announced for release in the near future have been made during the past few months and in a number of them noted stars of the legitimate stage are featured. Conway Tearle and Francine Larrimore are among the names that appear in the productions thus far named, and it is known that other pictures featuring other dramatic stars with established reputations have been produced at Bedford Park recently.

Conway Tearle and Francine Larrimore are co-stars in "The Heart of the Hills." Other pictures that have been announced for release are "A Message to Garcia," "The Ghost of Old Moro," "The Princess from the Poorhouse," "The Cossack Whip," and "The Ladder of Ambition."

"A Message to Garcia" and "The Ghost of Old Moro" were filmed in Cuba. In both of these productions Mabel Trunnelle and Robert Conness take the principal parts. "A Message to Garcia" is based on the famous preachment of the late Elbert Hubbard.

Francine Larrimore takes the leading part in "The Princess from the Poorhouse," which is described as a fairy tale of real life. Supporting Miss Larrimore appear Richard Tucker, Charles Sutton, Herbert Pattee and William Wadsworth.

James Oppenheim is the author of "The Cossack Whip," a story of Russia and Russian intrigue, and has adhered closely to actual conditions so that the production has an educational as well as an entertaining value.

Mabel Trunnelle and Robert Conness are again co-stars in "The Ladder of Ambition."

It is stated at the Edison studios that the highest ideals in picture production have been adhered to in the making of the five-reel features named above and in others that will be marketed in the future through the Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay combination. In every case the utmost care has been used in the selection of a story, this being given precedence over any other feature of the production. The casts have been made up of players who possessed the qualifications to best portray the characterizations demanded by the scripts.

President Carl Laemmle of Universal was once a bundle wrapper or something in the Boston department store, Chicago. Mrs. Mollie Netcher Neuberger worked there too. Carl went into the film business; Mrs. Mollie stayed at home. And they've both managed to keep out of the poorhouse. Mrs. Neuberger's store now does an annual business of $20,000,000 and Mr. Laemmle—but everybody knows all about his tidy little business. The two leads in this business scenario are shown above during Mrs. Newberger's recent visit to Universal City.

Change in Paramount Release Dates

Exhibitors throughout the Illinois and Indiana territory will be interested in the following changes in Paramount releases:

"The Soul of Kuri San," a Lasky production with Hayakawa and Stedman, will be released October 30 instead of November 13. "The Plow Girl," a Famous Players production with Mae Murray, will be released November 13, instead of November 20. "Miss George Washington," Marguerite Clark's first release on Famous Players program, will be released on November 20 instead of October 30.

Cast for New Michelena Film

In the cast that plays important roles in "The Passion Flower," the most recently completed Michelena feature, by the California Motion Picture Corporation, the comedy relief for the seven part picture is largely furnished by Clarence Arper, the Colonel Starbottle of "Salomy Jane" fame.

Chief support to Beatriz Michelena in this production is furnished by Andrew Robson, William Pike and Albert Morrison, of which trio the first two also appeared with her in "Salomy Jane" as Yuba Bill, the stage driver, and Red Pete, the stage robber, respectively.

Pauline Frederick in Wild Role

Pauline Frederick is next to be presented on the Paramount Program, in "Nanette of the Wilds," written expressly for her by Willard Mack, and that popular dramatist and actor will appear in the production in support of the star. To get the exact atmospheric surroundings for this production, Pauline Frederick and a supporting company under the direction of Joseph Kaufman have gone to the western part of Canada, where all the exteriors will be staged.

MOTOGRAPHY:

In one of your back numbers I read an article entitled "Do We Know Our Own Business?" dealing with opposition in the theater business in a small town, which I thought was very good. As I have prospects of opposition here I would like to get the magazine containing this article and show it to the prospective competitor. If you can find this magazine and send it to me with an invoice for your trouble I will gladly send a check for same.

PARAMOUNT'S PRODUCTIONS

Blanche Sweet and Dustin Farnum Starred in Features. Next Paramount Comedy November 13

Blanche Sweet and Dustin Farnum are the stars in the two leading features on the Paramount program for the week of November 6. Miss Sweet will appear in "Unprotected," a Lasky production, in which she is surrounded by an all-star cast headed by Theodore Roberts, Ernest Joy, Tom Forman, Walter Long, Mrs. Lewis McCord, Robert Gray and Jane Wolf. Mr. Farnum co-stars with Winnifred Kingston in "A Son of Erin," a Pallas production. The supporting cast is composed of Tom Bates, Jack Livingston, Wilfred McDonald, Wallace Pyke, Lee Willard, Mabel Wiles and Hugh B. Koch.

Surrounding the features for the week are Paramount single-reel releases, the 39th edition of the magazine-on-the-screen, Paramount Pictographs, the 40th weekly "Trip Around the World" conducted by Burton Holmes, and the Paramount-Burton Holmes Travel Pictures, in which Classic Greece is visited; and a Paramount-Bray Cartoon entitled "Farmer Al Falfa's Prune Plantation."

Beginning with this week in the Paramount Pictographs, Dr. George Burbank Shattuck, Professor of Geology in Vassar College, will release his exceptional pictures recently taken in the heart of Alaska, and entitled "People of the Alaskan Wilderness," and showing unusual and interesting conditions which exist among the native Indians and Eskimo inhabitants living in their semi-barbarous state on the outskirts of civilization.

"Putting the Nut to Work" is another interesting subject in this magazine, showing how the famous vegetable nut which comes from South America is made into millions of suspender and coat buttons.

"Furry Favorites" in the cat family which boasts of the most ancient lineage of any of our modern house pets, are shown in this picture, while a great amount of action is obtained in the picture entitled "Horse Sense," in which is pictured the wonderful strides that have been made in teaching and training ponies so that they can take an active and intelligent part in the game of polo.

Burton Holmes goes to Classic Greece this week. The trip begins at Patmos and goes to Athens, visiting all the interesting points enroute, including the wonderful Gorge of Diakofts, the celebrated Corinthian Canal, the king's palaces, and points of like interest.

"Farmer Al Falfa's Prune Plantation," a Paramount-Bray Cartoon for this week, is from the pen of Paul Terry.

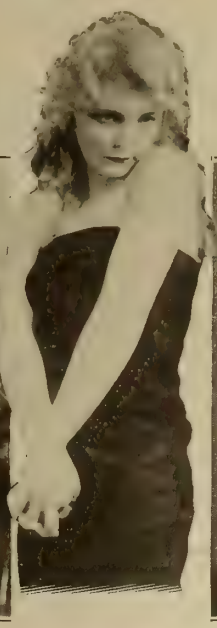
The next Paramount Comedy will be released on November 13, entitled "A Villainous Pursuit."

Paramount has issued to all of its exchanges, and through them to all its exhibitors, thousands of dollars' worth of advertising and publicity aids, by which they can attract larger clienteles through their weekly program of features and single reels. With each production, Paramount is now giving special aids, through their exhibitors' aids department in the different exchanges.

"Musty" Suffers for Essanay

George K. Spoor, president of Essanay, is planning a strong line of one and two reel comedies to be released on the Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay service.

Harry Watson, Jr., is the first comedian to be engaged for this work. Negotiations practically have been completed for several other comedians to work for Essanay. These comedies will be released through Essanay's new service, in order that exhibitors can readily book a short comedy to go with a feature making a complete program for those who desire it.



Mr. Watson already is at the Essanay studios in Chicago and will begin work on the floor at once. The "Mishaps of Musty Suffer" will be continued.

Dr. Shattuck Joins Paramount

Dr. George Burbank Shattuck, Professor of Geology in Vassar College and authority on this subject in the country, has joined the Paramount forces, and will release through Paramount's "magazine-on-the-screen," the Paramount Pictographs, his remarkable pictures entitled "In the Heart of the Alaskan Wilder-

The first of these pictures will be called "People of the Alaskan Wilderness," and will show the unusual and interesting conditions which exist among the native Indians and Esquimaux inhabitants living in a semi-barbaric state on the outskirts of civilization. Pictures are shown of Ruby, a typical mining camp, which sprang up over night; the trading post of Tolovana, where provisions are supplied in exchange for valuable furs; the work being done on the Government railroad; and intimate views of Esquimaux family life.

This subject will be followed by others showing the gold fields and other interesting features.

TWO TRIANGLE TRIUMPHS

Bessie Love and Louise Glaum in Late October Releases—Soldiers Featured in "Our American Boys in European War"

The Triangle Film Corporation's releases for the week of October 29 star Bessie Love and Louise Glaum in the principal offerings. Miss Love appears in "A Sister of Six," produced under the direction of C. M. and S. A. Franklin. The scenes of the play are divided between Old California under the Mexican regime and the seacoast of New England. Miss Glaum enacts the part of a secret service siren in the Ince production of Richard Harding Davis' war drama, "Somewhere in France," under the direction of Charles Giblyn. Howard Hickman shares the stellar honors with Miss Glaum in this remarkable feature.

Norma Talmadge hits the hemp in Triangle-Fine Arts' "Fifty-Fifty."

After leading comparatively charmed lives for many months the young Americans shown in "Our American Boys in the European War" have begun to pay the toll of their courage. William Barbour of Toledo, Ohio, is one of the heroes who almost lost his life in a deed of bravery while serving in the ambulance service. For a while his life was despaired of, but he is now home on a furlough and is putting on the Triangle war film in Oberlin and Toledo.

He is more fortunate than two other Americans who lost their lives "in discharge of duty." Edward Joseph Kelly, of Philadelphia, was shot at midnight while rescuing wounded from the trenches; Kiffen Rockwell of Winston-Salem, N. C., who is shown in a "close-up" in "Our American Boys in the European War," with his big warplane for a background, met death while engaged in a thrilling aerial battle and Bert Hall nearly lost his life attempting to save him.

PATHE'S NEW SCENIC FILMS

New Process of Combination Toning to Be Used in Scenic Films Under Name of "Know America, the Land We Love"

The Pathe Exchange has secured the exclusive rights to a series of pictures treated by a new process of combined toning invented by F. W. Hochstetter. This is not a color photography but an ordinary black and white negative is so treated that from five to ten different tones are given to each inch of film, and yet only one toning bath is necessary.

The pictures to be made under this process will consist of a carefully constructed exposition of the most beautiful scenery in the United States, and will probably be released under the title of "Know America, the Land We Love." The pictures will be made under the auspices of the National Highway Association with the co-operation of Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior.

Filming has already been started in "The Garden of the Gods." The Grand Canyon and other scenic wonders of the southwest will be filmed and the winter will be spent in visiting the beauty spots of the south.

Earning Power of Spectacle

The possible earning power of a big film spectacle has been estimated by Robert W. Priest, publicity director for Thomas H. Ince's "Civilization." Mr. Priest has applied his figures particularly to the big Ince spectacle. Following are some of his deductions:

The population of the United States and its dependencies to the people of which "Civilization" at this time is in process of being presented, totals approximately 110,000,000. On the assumption that each unit of this aggregate paid a nickel to see "Civilization" within the next two years, we should have a sum approximating $5,500,000 as the gross takings of the production, which would establish a world's record.

The people of the United States spend, it is computed, about $500,000,000 each year to see motion pictures. If one per cent of this money is attracted by "Civilization" the picture in its first year will earn $5,000,000.

"Civilization" has an indefinite earning capacity, but for the sake of argument, we will assume that its lease of earning power is restricted to seven years. Then we should have the amazing figures of the total revenue of between $30,000,000 and $40,000,000. But in all probability this amount will be exceeded. The $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 will simply come from the population of the United States, but the other parts of the world, as already hinted at, are enthusiastic in the patronage of motion pictures, so that, still adhering to the same period of seven years, we should have a total revenue far in excess of the $80,000,000, if it is estimated that the entire population of the globe saw the picture, and paid its nickel to do so.

It is not by any means, therefore, unreasonable to assume that within this period of time the total revenue taken in by motion picture exhibitors in all parts of the world by the showing of "Civilization," to the public, will at least total $100,000,000

$25,000 for Chicago Rights

The rights for Chicago and Cook County, Illinois, for Thomas Ince's "Civilization" have been purchased by the Amalgamated Theaters Corporation of Chicago. The price is $25,000. The deal was made in Chicago on October 13 by J. P. Grainger, acting for Mr. Ince.

Ruth Stonehouse, the Chicago girl formerly with Essanay, and now a Universal star, recently filmed and played the lead in her own story, "Mary Anne's First Job."

Suggestions of the spectacular nature of Fox's "A Daughter of the Gods," and Annette Kellermann, the daring diving star.

"A Daughter of the Gods"

Annette Kellermann Stars in Big Fox Spectacle. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"A DAUGHTER OF THE GODS" contains numerous "mob" scenes, some striking bits of photography and Annette Kellermann, in addition to a fantastic story whose best moments are quite charming. Of the important features mentioned the star probably stands above the others by an appreciable margin. Miss Kellermann's proficiency in swimming and diving is inspiring to behold and every time when it seems that mobs and Oriental splendor are about to lose their attractiveness through familiarity a flash of Miss Kellermann jumping into the water and giving wonderful exhibitions of natatorial artistry comes as a revivifying element that diverts the spectator's mind and prepares it to enjoy with fresh vigor more big spectacular pictures.

"A Daughter of the Gods" had its premier showing at the Lyric Theater, New York, to a typically "first night" audience on Tuesday evening, October 17. Of course, the audience applauded with that mechanical regularity characteristic of the first night. But it is something more than a mere surmise to say that "A Daughter of the Gods" will bring rounds of applause at each and every showing given the film. The picture possesses a certain indefinable ability that makes the spectator feel that its every scene is worthy of the beholder's strict attention.

The story's main point seems to be that of giving the star opportunities. In this it is successful to a degree. Annette Kellermann as Anita, the Beautiful, wanders through wood and desert, Arabic streets and gaudy harems and best of all she disports on wave-lashed reefs and in placid pools. And her graceful form is quite as free as nature itself. So it is with several others in the picture. If the affections of the theater-going public are captured by sylph-like girls in Garden of Eden costume then surely "A Daughter of the Gods" should live long and fondly in the memories of those who see the film.

In the elaborateness of the production this offering bears the stamp of Fox pictures. The Oriental city which was erected and in the final scene destroyed to make a flaming and smoky climax to the spectacular phase of "A Daughter of the Gods" is a huge affair and a realistic one on the screen. The interiors are equally as elaborate, though a bit too complete in furnishings and properties. The spacious hall in which the Sultan entertains and is entertained is of massive proportions. It is in this hall that Anita, after making an entrance that is just a bit too theatrical and stagey, dances and so wins the approval of the Sultan.

The prologue is, from a standpoint of story, quite the best part of the picture. The tale is charming and not a little poetic. The main story tells of Anita's adventures. Anita faces many perils, the most pleasing of them being those which force her to take to the water to escape the toils of the wicked old Sultan. Miss Kellermann's dive from the tower is beautiful. And the race in the ocean in which Anita is pursued by a group of blacks who have great speed in swimming is thrilling, but no more so than the flashes of Anita struggling to loose the bonds which hold her hand and foot while being swept along with the current and later dashed against a coral reef by vicious waves.

The battle scenes employ countless numbers of extras who fight real well. They are realistic scenes and rather exciting but not proportionally impressive. Some excellent double exposure work produces an interesting effect. According to the story the hordes of gnomes Anita leads against the Sultan's city are to become men of valor and power while Anita leads them and at a certain point in the journey the gnomes become powerful and finely mounted soldiers.

Herbert Brenon placed his confidence in the appeal of the mass scene and Miss Kellermann's physical charm and skill in diving and swimming to carry the fanciful story along to success. His confidence, it would seem, was well placed.

Throughout the picture one is impressed with the costliness of the production and the screen patrons who derive pleasure from viewing "A Daughter of the Gods" must naturally feel indebted to the producer who made so pretentious a film possible. Wm. Fox has shown that he is willing to advance great sums of money to give picturegoers big and complete screen spectacles.

Miss Kellermann has an able cast supporting her. William E. Shay, when he wears a turban at least, is a princely figure. The two Lee children, Katherine and Jane, do some splendid work. Mlle. Marcelle is an Oriental beauty of much allure, and Violet Horner a convincing vampire. Hal de Forest, Edward Boring, Henrietta Gilbert, Ricca Allen, Stuart Holmes and Walter James are also in the cast.

The Week's Selig Plays

"Out of the Shadows," and "A Close Call." Reviewed by Genevieve Harris.

"OUT OF THE SHADOWS," not quite two reels long, has a dramatic value which will win the commendation of uncritical, sensation loving audiences. The story, written by Will M. Ritchie and produced under the direction of Burton L. King, has suspense, a surprise and a sentimental happy ending. Its various characters are types clearly defined and conventionally acted. The offering is well adapted to the cheaper grade picture houses. It is a release of October 23.

The story, which has a "vampire" tone, begins with the request of Mrs. Frank Lord (Eugenie Forde) that a detective watch the actions of her husband, who seems to be losing his interest in home life. The son of the family, Paul (Leo J.

Pierson), is also causing his fiancee, Rose (Luella Maxam), unhappiness by his growing indifference. Paul, we are shown, has become infatuated with an adventuress, Flora (Virginia Kirtley).

The detective finds that Lord, Sr., is also spending much of his time with this woman. He summons Mrs. Lord to a cafe where he believes Lord and the adventuress will meet. Paul, the son, is also called. There is a rather dramatic family meeting, but things are straightened out when the father declares that he made the engagement with Flora and then sent for his son in order to disillusion the boy regarding her real character. So Flora loses out, Lord virtuously returns home with Mrs. Lord, while Paul seeks Rose, and everyone is supposed to live happily ever after.

To complete the second reel, we have an amusing slap-stick comedy, "Paradise for a Day," dealing with two tramps, one real, the other a gentleman in disguise. The real one gets all the good things planned for the other, while the pseudo vagabond is locked in jail for the theft the first committed. The actors make the most of the comic situations and the offering is good for a number of laughs.

"A CLOSE CALL," the one-reel western for the week, of October 23, contains some unusually fast and clever riding stunts by Tom Mix, which are the feature of the picture and more important than story or acting. A well trained pony displays a few of his tricks before the camera. The release, like other Tom Mix plays, will appeal chiefly to those who enjoy watching good horsemanship.

"Heart of the Hills"

Produced by Edison and Released by K. E. S. E. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A NOVEL by David Whitelaw entitled "The Girl from the East," is picturized in this Kleine-Edison-Selig-Essanay offering produced by Edison under the direction of Richard Ridgely. "The Heart of the Hills" is in its pictured form quite British. There is an air of mystery surrounding all the characters more or less and at times the mystery grows heavy though when everything is explained it seems all very simple. By "heavy" we do not mean confusing, for there is no difficulty whatever in following the main and minor lines of action, but there is a little too much made of the mystery element to be really effective.

The story provides many incidents and a good deal of action and as long as these two elements can be brought together without straining the picture is almost sure to hold the attention of all audiences successfully. Without being remarkable as to story, "The Heart of the Hills" is entertaining.

The offering makes its strongest appeal through its picturesqueness and splendid photography. Mr. Ridgely can do a great deal with romance. He has an eye for pictures and the settings as well as the grouping of the players in them are the most delightful part of "The Heart of the Hills," especially is this so of the love scenes.

Mabel Trunnelle gives a sincere and appealing performance as Hester. Hester is the daughter of Sir Christopher Madgwick by his first wife, a Eurasian, whom he married in India, thereby incurring the enmity of Sani. The latter kidnaps their child and kills the woman who spurned his love for that of the Englishman. Years later the girl is sent to England to recover a jewel which Sani stole and which fell into the hands of Madgwick.

Madgwick has two other children, a young woman of haughty poise and the son is a worthless chap. Hester falls in love with a young barrister and she revolts against the ties which bind her to the Indian seditionists who have brought her up to respect and follow their customs and beliefs. Some melodrama figures in bringing the story to a conclusion. In the end she marries Redgell.

Conway Tearle is featured with Miss Trunnelle. Mr. Tearle's characterization of the barrister is highly effective. There is a large supporting cast in which Bigelow Cooper, Ray McKee, Robert Conness, Edith Strickland, Marie LaCorio and Herbert Prior distinguish themselves. George Lane's photographic effects are good.

"The Scarlet Runner"

Vitagraph Series Released by V. L. S. E. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A BALLOON proves a life-giving element to a plot of little vitality in "The Lost Girl," which is the tenth episode of the "Scarlet Runner" series, written by C. N. and A. M. Williamson. A balloon ascension, flashes of it sailing about up near the clouds and its descent account for the interest which attaches to this release.

Views of Race's aerial journey with a balloonist whose sweetheart has been torn from him by a grouchy guardian are introduced at just the right moments to make "The Lost Girl" one of the most pleasing of the series.

"The Lost Girl" tells of a young woman who is spirited away by her guardian. Paul Westen, her fiance, is worried about her and he meets Race just as he is about to have a ride in the balloon he has won many prizes with. Race accepts his invitation to join him in the trip. They descend in a part of the country of which they know nothing and see the girl Westen is seeking on the porch of a secluded house. It is not possible for them to dismount so they ascend again and come down when the first clearing presents itself.

Race decides that they are not far from where they started originally and he and Westen run along and soon come to the place where Race has parked his motor. Scarlet Runner makes a speedy trip. Along the road they pass a motor in which they see the girl in custody of a policeman. They continue on their way and arrive at the house to find that the guardian is dead and the girl arrested. At the coroner's inquest Race and Westen are able to furnish evidence which clears the girl of the imputation of crime and all ends happily.

"The Gilded Cage"

Alice Brady in World Drama Released October 9. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

IN true beauty, and the glamor of romance, this offering of the Peerless studios on the World program has seldom been equaled. One might liken it, in comparison to the usual type of five-reel drama, to a vivid bit of poetry among prose stories. It has the fancy and color of a fairy tale, combined with real dramatic strength. It is an excellent blending of beauty and force.

Its story, which is laid in a small European kingdom called Balkany, is based on the prince-in-disguise and the goose girl-queen situation, one which has served admirably in a number of popular novels. In plot outlines, there is little of the unusual. It is the excellence of the telling that is commendable. The story rises to dramatic heights frequently, the spirited defiance of the ill-fated king and queen, and the return to the palace of Princess Honore after the death of her parents, for instance, while suspense is skillfully held during the preparations for the execution of the Prince Boris.

Harley Knoles directed the play, from a story by J. I. C. Clarke, scenarioized by Frances Marion. The continuity and emphasis of the narrative, the fineness of the settings, many of which represent old-world castle and country scenes, the excellence of the photography, go to form a most satisfactory whole. Alice Brady easily runs away with the acting honors. As the young queen, she blends dignity, pathos and girlishness without once striking a false note. The supporting cast is commendable.

The appeal of the story is to an imaginative, drama loving audience, though not necessarily "high-brow." Perhaps a youthful audience will like it best, and it has distinct value in a children's and young people's program. Not that the elders will not enjoy it also, but its romantic appeal is essentially youthful.

The Story: The king and queen of the kingdom of Balkany are slain by their own subjects. Their young daughter, the Princess Honore, is taken from the convent where she is being educated, to become the unhappy queen, completely dominated by her prime minister. But the girl learns that the people are discontented and, disguised as a peasant girl, goes among them. There she meets a young prince who has renounced his title to become a leader of the people. Since it would be to the prime minister's advantage to remove this leader, he is arrested for treason. A peasant girl with him is also thrown into prison, the officers not knowing that the girl is the new queen in disguise.

Sentence of death is passed on the prince, the order forged with the queen's name by the prime minister. The queen escapes, through the aid of a peasant girl, and returns to the palace. She learns of the ordered execution, but is too late to stop it. However, an uprising of the people saves the prince. The people learn that the prime minister is the cause of their trouble and kill him. The queen then chooses as her consort the prince-leader, to the delight of her people.

"Atta Boy's Last Race"

Triangle-Fine Arts Featuring Dorothy Gish. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"ATTA BOY'S LAST RACE" is a melodrama in which Dorothy Gish appears as a devoted lover of the thoroughbred. Miss Gish is cast as the daughter of a horseman and she is well versed in the care and handling of a runner. She is characteristically attractive in the part and with the aid of some good direction she makes "Atta Boy's Last Race" fairly entertaining throughout its five reels.

Tod Browning, who wrote the story, used situations of the lurid melodramatic type. We see the gambler use his mortgage to get possession of Lois Brandon's pet horse after she has brought him back to racing condition and again the mortgage when her mother advances the money to buy Atta Boy from Spencer and cannot pay off the lien on the house. These are things that have been seen before. The only surprise in "Atta Boy's Last Race" comes when Lois, who is now supposed to have no money at all, succeeds in racing Atta Boy in an event with a rich purse for the winner. Most entry fees usually have the decimal point after a couple of figures, not before them. But there is no use picking out the technical errors. "Atta Boy's Last Race" is held within the class of fair offerings through its lack of originality and quality, not its occasional improbabilities.

Dorothy Gish and Keith Armour in "Atta Boy's Last Race."

Though Lois loves horses, she hates gambling. Her father was ruined through gambling and she exacts a promise from Jim Spencer not to gamble again. Spencer's horses are now owned by Jarvis Johnson with the exception of Atta Boy, which is now badly lame. When Atta Boy rounds into shape under the care of Lois, Johnson takes him, too. But the horse breaks out of the stable and returns to Lois. She then pays Johnson the amount under which the horse is listed in the mortgage he holds and the gambler is forced against his will to accept. Then it is up to Atta Boy to win just one race. He does and thus pays off the mortgage on the home.

George Siegmann produced the picture. Keith Armour, Carl Stockdale—who makes a convincing horseman—Loyola O'Connor, Adelle Clifton, and Tom Wilson are included in the cast.

"The Last Man"

V. L. S. E. Offering Is Photographically Beautiful. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE excellence of the photography and good direction are the outstanding features of "The Last Man," a Greater Vitagraph production in which Mary Anderson and William Duncan appear at the head of a capable cast. The story is by James Oliver Curwood and it takes its title from the hero's fight to hold a post in the Philippines against an attack by a band of Moros who have gone on the war-path. Harvey, who throughout the play is a man whose deeds of courage stamp him as a super-hero, is the last man at the post and he holds the Moros off until the others make good their escape.

"The Last Man" is a Philippine story.

The story moves rather slowly, at times the spectator's interest in the play itself dwindles to a mere nothing. All that is told could have been told in less than five reels. But the attractive settings and atmosphere of the picture help the story wonderfully. "The Last Man" is another instance of a mediocre love romance becoming pleasant through the life given it by effective presentation and splendid photography.

Mr. Duncan is Major Harvey, a surgeon who is stationed at a post in the West. His wife, whom he loves greatly, is a flirt and she carries on an affair with a Lieutenant Horne. Harvey discovers them in each other's arms one day and he orders them both to keep their distance from him thereafter.

Harvey then asks to be sent back to the Philippines. Jeanne MacDonald accompanies him, for his friendship is all she has in the world since the death of her father. Later, the Hornes are sent to the Islands, but to a post farther in the interior than that at which Harvey is stationed. The surgeon is ordered to go to that post because there is an epidemic of cholera threatening. The day before he leaves he discovers that Jeanne loves him and he asks her to marry him when he returns from Fort Gordo. The fort is being attacked by Moros. Harvey is forced to fight off bands of them to reach the place; then he fights off the rest while his former wife and Horne escape. Lorna now wishes to leave Horne and go back to Harvey. She discovers that she loves him only. But she has killed his love and in the final scene Jeanne and Harvey marry.

One good thing about the play is that the old custom of killing off the parted and no longer desired wife is not observed. There were many times that things looked as though Lorna would meet her death, but we, for one, were glad she did not. Lorna has a deal of charm. Corinne Griffith makes the part so human in spite of its unrealness and so fascinating, too, that one could not help wishing that she would be happy in the end even if she was naughty in the beginning.

William Wolbert directed the production. The details of staging and general direction are a credit to Mr. Wolbert just as they would be to any other director of photoplay production. The battle scenes in the Philippines are good, but not impressive. We could not help wondering at the Moros for being so foolish as to climb over the high walls when the front gate stood wide open for them to just stroll past. The suspension-bridge action is exciting, even if it is familiar. The three or four natives who do the fall from the bridge to the swirling waters below enliven the last reel considerably. The photography throughout is of a quality that is remarkable. Much of the pleasure afforded by "The Last Man" can be accounted for by the photography.

Miss Anderson and Mr. Duncan are supported by Otto Lederer, who plays two parts, Jack Mower and Corinne Griffith.

"The Beach Comber"

Two-Reel Essanay Comedy Released October 31. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

HARRY DUNKINSON again demonstrates his genuine fun-making ability in this comedy which will give to any audience a half hour's acceptable entertainment. Without slapstick or burlesque, in a spirited, clever fashion the company present a number of humorous situations which arise when Andy Laflin (Dunkinson), a traveling salesman, plays hero at a summer resort. The supporting cast is good, as are direction, photography and settings.

The Story: When Andy Laflin arrives at Resthaven, he finds the young ladies "peeved" because the young men do not take kindly to the idea either of being Grecian dancers or of playing the ukulele. Andy volunteers to take part in the classic dances, and he demonstrates his skill with a ukelele, thereby winning the attention of the girls and arousing the jealousy of the men. The latter sprinkle the floor with tacks when he appears in flowing robes in the Grecian pageant.

Andy continues in favor with the ladies but not with his firm, whose business he neglects. He is fired by the company, but is given a position at the resort as life saver. He really cannot swim, but fate aids him in keeping this fact from the public until one of the men, suspicious of his ability, pretends to be drowning. Andy not only cannot save him, but nearly drowns himself, to the disgust of his former admirers. But he is able to regain his first position as salesman, and he gladly leaves the resort after destroying his ukulele through which he first got into trouble.

"Faith"

Six-Reel American Drama Released October 30. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

"FAITH," Mary Miles Minter's latest picture role, is one of those optimistic children who are so popular in books and plays. This photoplay, which is developed in a very leisurely manner, reminds one strongly of the type of sweet, sentimental fiction mentioned. That a great many people like this form of Faith becomes a servant in the Thorpe home.

confection has been demonstrated, and by many of that class the photoplay version will be equally appreciated. However, where the author of a book may take time to explain away improbabilities in action and situation, the picture producers must substitute character drawing and touches of humor to make their stories convincing. This has not been done in this play. It is lacking in humor and its characters are unreal.

The best factor in the play, the one on which its success will depend, is Mary Miles Minter. Her work stands out above the rest of the cast in quiet effectiveness. She puts her points across with a pleasing accuracy and makes the most of any opportunity given her. Although her director apparently wished to emphasize her prettiness and youth, Miss Minter herself shows she is above all a skillful actress.

James Kirkwood, who directed the play, is also its author. While the plot is complicated and contains the element of suspense, as well as emotional and dramatic scenes, its interest is lessened by the slow manner of its unfolding. Six reels is too long for the material or construction. The settings and photography are good.

The Story: Helen Thorpe (Lizette Thorne) is secretly married to a man her father disapproves of. Her husband is killed and when approaching motherhood forces Helen to confess her secret marriage, her father is furiously angry. When the baby is born, Thorpe places it in an orphan asylum, telling Helen that it died. Only the housekeeper and Thorpe know the truth.

Some fifteen years later, Thorpe has married again and is treating his step-daughter, seventeen-year-old Laura (Margaret Shelby) in the same rigorous way he had trained Helen, and she too is enmeshed in a secret love affair. Helen, a saddened woman, is unable to influence her father. And Faith, Helen's daughter, is in an orphan asylum.

Only the old housekeeper has kept track of Faith, and she seizes an opportunity to bring the girl into the Thorpe home as a servant. Faith, whose life is kept bright by the belief that "God's in His Heaven. All's right with the world," has always dreamed of miraculously discovering that she has a mother. This belief makes her unusually solicitious for the mothers of others. So when Laura, the daughter of the house, having come to grief through her clandestine love affair, steals money from Thorpe's safe, Faith assumes the guilt in order to save, not Laura, but Laura's mother.

Faith, however, had been kind not only to mothers, but had played "Little Sunshine" to the neighborhood in general, and had won as a friend Mark Strong (Perry Banks), once a brilliant lawyer, now a derelict. When Strong learns of the affair, he uses his dormant power to free the girl, and of course his investigations disclose the fact of Faith's parentage and of Thorpe's roguery. Faith finds her mother, and all those who deserve happiness are given it.

"The Undertow"

Five-Reel American Drama Released October 23. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

FRANKLYN RITCHIE and Helene Rosson are featured in this picture which was directed by Frank Thorne from a story by Rosalie Ashton. The story, which was first announced as "Esther of the People," deals with a labor problem. But it is not too heavy and it contains a romance which wins the sympathy. The play is marked by sincerity in acting and production. The interest is not allowed to drag, and the drama as a whole has an appeal.

Helene Rosson is especially pleasing as Esther. Franklyn Ritchie plays with dignity the role James King, a laborer who becomes the head of the factory. Eugenie Ford has an important and difficult role as the wife who fails to progress with her husband. Orral Humphrey plays with skill the part of Hammond, the unjust general manager. Harry Von Meter and George Ahern play sympathetic roles as John Morden, the foreman, and his protege, David Strong.

The Story: James King, although an unskilled laborer, is ambitious to better himself. He spends his spare time studying. His wife, however, is utterly without ambition and laughs at him. Some years later, we meet King as the head of a large factory. He is wealthy but unhappy because of his disagreeable home life. Mrs. King, in the new circumstances, cares only for the more garish side of society, and she and her husband have become entirely estranged.

John Morden, a foreman in the factory, has adopted David Strong, a young worker. Later, Morden becomes the guardian of his brother's daughter, Esther, a well educated girl left penniless by the death of her father. Esther goes to work in the factory and she and King meet. King is attracted by the girl.

There is discontent among the employes of the factory and they try in vain to bring their grievances before King. Hammond, the factory manager and cause of the trouble, prevents them from gaining a hearing. They threaten to strike. Esther again begs them to appeal to King. The letter of appeal never reaches King. Instead, Hammond persuades King to close the factory, creating hardship among the workers.

At length Fate gives Esther a chance to speak to King personally about the unfair conditions. She also reveals Hammond's true nature. King sets about remedying matters, inspired by his love for the girl. And when Mrs. King, who had been suing him for divorce, is killed in an accident, King and Esther are married.

"Fifty-Fifty"

Triangle-Fine Arts Melodrama Dealing with Domestic Triangle. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"FIFTY-FIFTY," the Triangle-Fine Arts offering which deals with a domestic triangle, starts promisingly and ends sweetly. If the picture fails to please picturegoers the blame must be placed upon the story, which is filled with unconvincing turns and twists. In spite of a remarkably good production and interpretations given by players of proven ability "Fifty-Fifty" seems to take a very long time to reach the conclusion in which the pretty wife and the rather fickle husband are brought together once more in a union that should be infinitely happy.

"Fifty-Fifty" tells of a young woman, an artist, who lives the carefree life of her companions and neighbors who reside in the little Bohemia which thrives in the vicinity of Washington Square. Naomi marries a business man who is prosperous. After their baby comes Naomi has no more desire to seek any other pleasures than those her home and child afford her. Her husband, however, wishes to go about and finally he does, but he goes alone. The husband takes to paying a great deal of attention to Helen Carew. Later he wants to be free and asks Naomi to divorce him. She refuses, so he allows Helen to compromise Naomi. There is a divorce action and in court, when it appears that the custody of the baby will be given to the husband, Naomi dramatically says that he is not the father of her child. Following this the husband finds out that Helen has a past and a shadow of that past comes back in the person of a Sing Sing graduate. The judge affects a reconciliation in the scene immediately preceding the one in which Naomi and Harmon embrace as the final fadeout makes its appearance.

The production was directed by Allan Dwan. Norma Talmadge heads a cast which includes J. W. Johnston, Ruth Darling, H. S. Northrup and Marie Chambers. These people, whose talents have won them a high place in the regard of the picture-going public, make "Fifty-Fifty" all that it is—an interesting visualization of a story that at times is serious in intent and farcical in fact.

"Romeo and Juliet"

Shakespeare Offered by Metro with Bushman and Bayne. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE "Romeo and Juliet" in photoplay form which Metro offers is remarkably good. It would seem that the program which states that Metro presents William Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet" is not far from the truth, for even your Shakespeare enthusiast will probably say that there is Shakespeare in this production of his most pleasing work. It is quite singular that such a pleasing screen production could be given "Romeo and Juliet" and that the producers are to be congratulated seems to have no question connected with it.

Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne in Metro's "Romeo and Juliet."

To begin with, this eight-reel film offering is an entertaining and consistently interesting picture. From its opening, which follows a few fleeting but quite uninteresting introductions of the leading characters, the picture holds the spectator's attention and the play grows in dramatic tensity as it nears the tragedy which has been admitted "irresistibly affecting" whether it come from between covers or over the footlights. The production is an attractive one, the acting is particularly good and the many scenes are busy and effective in their presentation of the important incidents which were spread with so lavish a hand throughout the play.

Francis X. Bushman as Romeo is seen, perhaps, to better advantage than ever in the past. He is naturally a handsome Romeo, and for the most part a good one, if in some respects a Romeo not especially true to some of the speaking stage's ideals in the matter. The majority of Mr. Bushman's scenes are rendered in a convincing and forceful manner, in other words it is a praiseworthy performance.

Beverly Bayne's Juliet pleases mightily. In the role she leaves nothing to be desired and it is just possible that her performance will not be surpassed by any future screen Juliets that may happen along. In her most important scenes Miss Bayne does splendidly, as for instance when she learns of the death of Tybalt at the hands of Romeo, and—but they are too numerous to single out here.

Olaf Skavlan as Benvolio and Fritz Leiber as the jocund Mercutio are remarkably good. Robert Cummings as Friar Laurence, Adelle Barker as the Nurse, W. Lawson Butt as Tybalt are also commendable; for the matter of that so too are Helen Dunbar, Edmund Elton, Eric Hudson and all the other members of a large cast.

The scenario was written by Rudolph de Cordova, who in doing so observed all the rules it seems, and who, it might be remarked in passing, is deserving of a great deal of credit. The production was directed by John W. Noble assisted by Mr. Bushman, Edward Elsner and Mr. de Cordova.

Those scenes requiring the element with the peculiar attractiveness to the writers of "ad copy" and known as supernumeraries show that Mr. Noble has lost none of his talents and ability in handling crowds and the other scenes are in all honesty remarkable for their evidences of capable direction. The offering is pretentious but the spectacular is never allowed to intrude or in any way lessen the effect of the story's progress.

The recreated Verona is a pleasing village with a convincing atmosphere about it. The interior settings are splendid and the photography very good, though it seems to us that some excellent opportunities for elaborate lightings were disregarded. But taken as a whole there is no fault to be found with the production while there is a quantity of praise due it. This Metro film should prove most satisfying to the great numbers it will naturally attract.

"The Rainbow Princess"

Five-Part Famous Player Circus Drama. Released October 23. Reviewed by George W. Graves.

ANN PENNINGTON'S second appearance in pictures is decidedly auspicious. In the role of the Rainbow Princess, a dainty circus performer who is used by her corrupt employers as the means to a dishonest end, she has a part to which she is eminently suited and in which she easily makes herself the center of attraction. The star has a chance in the course of the picture's progress to execute before her screen audiences some of the grotesquely fascinating steps of the Hula Hula dance with which she captivated so many audiences at the "Follies." This diversion is as pleasing as is another novelty—a parachute descent from a large balloon, which was particularly well performed and photographed. The jaunty circus atmosphere, the humorous as well as the sombre side of this life, is nicely delincated. There is much in the film that will appeal to children.

Briefly, the story, by Shannon Fife, is that of an unfortunate child of the circus who finds herself at the mercy of the harsh proprietor. The latter palms her off on Judge Daingerfield as his lost grand-daughter, he and his men adhering to a plausible story which they have doped up. For his guardianship the circus manager is well paid. Later on, however, the judge realizes he has been duped, much to his chagrin. Not satisfied with the success of this enterprise, the show people attempt to rob the judge's safe. In this attempt the circus manager is shot, but before his death he admits that the girl is innocent of any guilt in the plot. Just before the robbery, the Rainbow Princess, of her own accord, has gone back to the old life. So it is with delight that the judge's adopted son, at the suggestion of the lonely old man, brings the girl back.

William Courtleigh, Jr., appears as the judge's adopted son, a part which is not especially conspicious, but which he handles with ease and effectiveness. Grant Stewart makes a lovable and imposing character of the old judge. Charles Sutton is a good heavy. There are some excellent types in the large cast, including the two circus midgets and the "fat lady." J. Searle Dawley's direction measures up to a very good standard.

The exhibitor can count on "The Rainbow Princess" for a general appeal and for sustained interest. It makes a pleasing offering in spite of the fact of the plot's thinness. The photography is superb.

"Romeo and Juliet"

William Fox's Screen Interpretation Features Theda Bara. Reviewed by George W. Graves

SHAKESPEARE'S immortal tragedy, as put into a seven-reel motion picture by the William Fox forces, is one of the bigger photoplay productions of the year. Theda Bara essays her first Shakespearian role in this picture and the success she has had with it will astonish even her admirers. Somehow, though, we cannot help feeling that her type is not just that indicated in the work of the bard of Avon. However, in view of her great popularity and fine emotional acting, one may forget that she really does not look the part. Harry Hilliard is a much better type in his role. His acting as a whole is very effective and Romeo-like, but now and again he is a trifle too cold for the passionate youth.

The cast has been selected with great care. Glen White is a splendid Mercutio, Walter Law is the picture of Friar Laurence, and John Webb Dillion is as "fiery" as the part of Tybalt necessitates. Taking the parts of Paris, Montague, Capulet, Lady Montague and Lady Capulet, consecutively, are Einan Linden, Elwin Eaton, Edwin Holt, Victory Bateman and Helen Tracy.

Adrian Johnson, who is to be praised for his attractive photoplay arrangement of the story, shares honors with the director, J. Gordon Edwards. The latter has created a rich atmosphere, amply suggesting the custom and conditions of the period. The expansive street scene in Venice not only shows an expenditure of money but smacks of good taste. There were no offensive inconsistencies in the sets. Mr. Edwards has ably handled the great number of extras.

The climax was handled with credit to everyone concerned, and an audience cannot fail to feel the intense pathos which is the core of this tragedy. It is evident that time, money and skill were factors in the making of this Fox interpretation of "Romeo and Juliet."

the weeds on the way to Coney Island. Now this studio is the factory of one of the largest and foremost film producing concerns in the world. The Vitagraph Company has a name for attractive dependable product, and naturally, having been a unit in the organization during the six years of its tremendous development, Mr. Van shares in that name.

He started in comedy roles in pictures, and then added to his day's work directing and scenario writing. Some of the comedies in which Mr. Van figured as director as well as leading man are: "Stella Fourflush," three reels; "Love, Snow and Ice," three reels, and "The Man Behind the Door," four reels.

"Love, Luck and Gasoline," in which he shared the limelight with Lillian Walker and John Bunny, proved to be a best-seller. The "Cutey" series of one and two-reel comedies also occupies a place in the record of pictures in which he has been seen.

Mr. Van's last screen appearance was in "Putting Pep in Slowtown." This was about eight months ago. For a while following that picture's completion he was engaged in producing comedies and then he started upon the direction of "The Scarlet Runner," a C. N. and A. M. Williamson serial, featuring Earle Williams, now being released through the Vitagraph exchanges. This serial has the unique virtue of getting better as it goes along. Although Mr. Van has been very successful in the production of comedy-drama and drama, he much prefers comedy work, either directing or acting or both.

Mildred Considine has arrived in New York from Chicago to begin work in the scenario department of the Monmouth Film Corporation, where she will devote her time to editing, adapting and writing scenarios. She is at present completing the screen version of the "Jimmie Dale" series.

One of the comic episodes of "The Man Who Stood Still," in which Lew Fields plays the star part for Brady-Made World pictures, is a flat dwellers' amateur concert, in which the two elderly Germans play a flute and trombone respectively. The dogs downstairs howl dismally, the neighbors hurl bottles at the dogs, and the concert nearly disrupts the community, but the innocent old Germans play on.

"The Heart of a Hero," to be issued shortly by the World Film Corporation, follows the stage play, "Nathan Hale," written by Clyde Fitch for Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliott.

The title of Marie Dressler's new "Tillie" picture shortly to be issued by the World Film Corporation, has been shifted from "Tillie's Night Out" to "Tillie's Day Off," because most of the scenes took place in the day time.

Clara Kimball Young in "The Rise of Susan" will be issued on the regular World program early in December.

Ethel Clayton and Carlyle Blackwell are co-stars in "The New South" and "The Wall Beyond," both World-Brady pictures, the former to be issued next month and the latter in February.

Helen Greene, who became very ill while working in the Niagara Film Service picture, "Perils of Our Girl Reporters," has been spending several weeks at her summer home at Point Pleasant, N. J. Her health is improved and after a few more weeks of rest she will be able to start in on a new five-reel feature.

Lowell Stark has resigned from the scenario department of Metro Pictures Corporation to accept a position as traveling director for the People's Motion Picture Company. Mr. Stark will superintend the conducting of popularity contests at theaters throughout several states.

Anna Steese Richardson, well known novelist and journalist, has sold a scenario to Mme. Petrova, which the actress declares is one of the most powerful ever submitted to her. It will be put in production shortly.

Maury Stewart, one of the "Five Stewarts," is to play "David" in the Metro-Rolfe production of Margaret Deland's novel, "The Awakening of Helena Ritchie," in which Ethel Barrymore is featured.

Mme. Petrova has completed her work in "The Black Butterfly" and has begun scenes for a feminist play, as yet unnamed, from the pen of Anna Steese Richardson. Burton L. King, director of the first picture, is finishing the production while Edmund Lawrence directs the second play. The use of two directors in this tandem fashion proves a great time saver.

Lou-Tellegan, whose last photodrama was the Lasky picture, "The Black Wolf," has begun his season's tour on the speaking stage in "The King of Nowhere." He will go as far west as Omaha.

Louise Huff received the scare of her life the other day when she lost "Flopit," the tiny dog who appears as her pet in the Famous Players' version of "Seventeen." If the dog was not found, every scene of the play taken during three weeks would be ruined. But a policeman found "Flopit" asleep in a baby carriage near Miss Huff's home.

Lone Star Corporation: Bookings on the Mutual-Chaplin pictures are close to the $3,000,000 mark, and, as the company is beginning to accept business on the first four pictures at the lower rates, the total business eventually secured will probably be double the amount originally estimated. The market on the common still continues strong, although few trades have been reported in the preferred.

Mutual Film Corporation: Market has become quite active the past week with a slight improvement in quotations. Reports of numerous trades, particularly in the preferred, have been made. With the improved financial condition of the company, the expectant dividend resumption ought to take place at an early date and the indications are for a rising market in the stock.

North American Film Corporation: Trading in the common still continues brisk, with stock in good demand. It is rumored that liquidation will begin in the next ninety days.

New York Motion Picture Corporation: Reports of several sales in substantial blocks of stock have taken place recently at 25 to 30. However, buying quickly subsided when large blocks of stock were offered.

Vogue Films, Incorporated: Goes on a percentage basis—35% to the Mutual Film Corporation and 65% to the company, inside of the next thirty days. The Vogue Films, Inc., has brought about this arrangement in an effort to put out a higher standard of pictures. It is reliably reported that dividend disbursements will be shortly commenced.

It is announced that the Kleine organization will move to Chicago, as it is claimed Chicago represents the logical distribution point of the United States. This follows closely on a similar move on the part of the Mutual organization. The location will probably be somewhere in Wabash avenue, but this has as yet not been definitely decided.

Complete Record of Current Films

This record is intended to give, for the convenient use of the exhibitor in booking films, all the information about each film that it is possible to present in a space limited to one line. The classification is indicated by the letter at the left (D for drama, C for comedy, T for topical, S for scenic, E for educational, etc.) Next comes the date and the title, followed by the names of the stars in parentheses. At the extreme right hand end of the line is the distributor's booking number, preceded by the name of the producing company. The figure appearing just before this name indicates the number of reels—the italic letter S meaning a split reel.

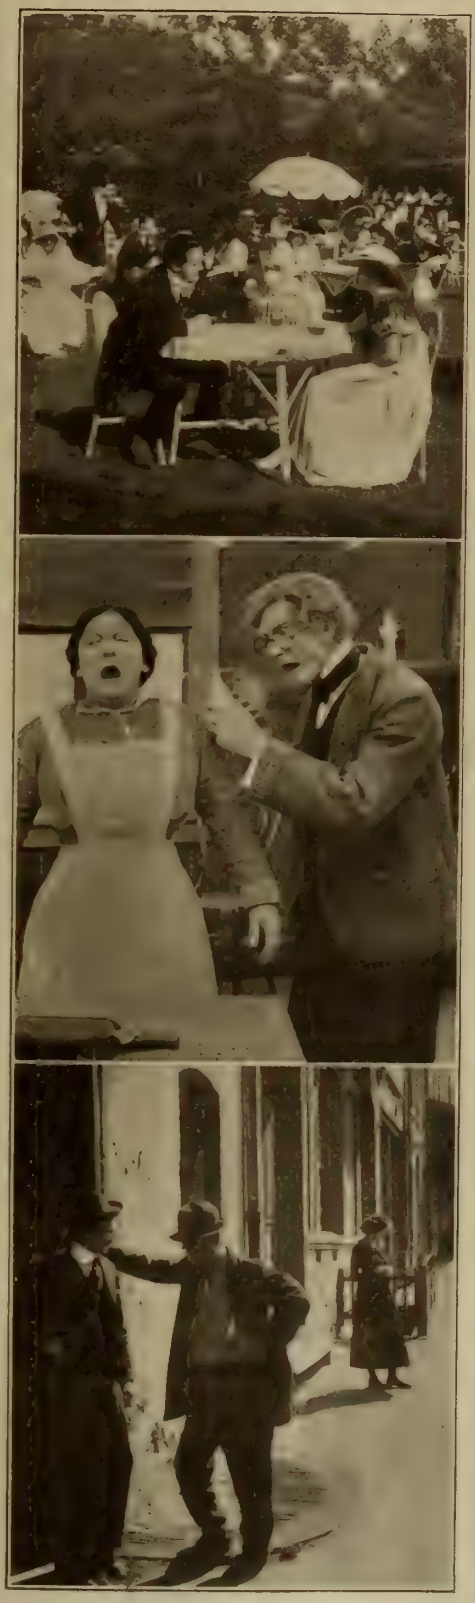
Brief Stories of the Week's Film Releases

General Program

The Goddess of Sagebrush Gulch—BIOGRAPH RE-ISSUE—OCTOBER 30.—Featuring Blanche Sweet. The Goddess meets the tenderfoot prospector and leaves him another worshiper of her. His chances, however, are slim for Blue Grass Pete has won her affections, he having at an oportune moment saved her from the fangs of a snake which was about to attack her. Pete is weak and is fascinated by the Goddess' sister, who visits her, and he later gives the sister his savings to keep. The Goddess, heartbroken over the loss of her sweetheart, is now sure they will be married and determines to leave. Pete's pal, knowing the girl has the savings, plans to steal them, but the Goddess overhears the plot and nature asserts itself, and securing aid she and the miners arrive in time to save her sister from a horrible death.

Small Town Stuff—(THREE REELS)—SELIG—OCTOBER 30.—Featuring an all-star cast. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.



The Power of the Press—BIOGRAPH—OCTOBER 31.—Featuring Lionel Barrymore. Steve Carson, a foreman, is sentenced to five years in prison for a crime which was committed by Turner Morgan, the discharged foreman of the Warner's shipyard. Morgan gains the information that Annie Hesford, Steve's wife, has been left a fortune by her uncle and manages to gain possession of the bank book and plans to marry Annie. Annie secures a position in the Grand Opera chorus and is befriended by Julia Seymour, the prima donna, whose husband is Steve's cell-mate. They are released for good behavior on Christmas day and Steve applies for a position in the shipyard, but is prevented by Morgan from securing a place. Morgan loses the bank book and it is delivered to Annie, and the motive for Morgan's persecution is clear. Through the press Steve's innocence is proclaimed and Morgan's infamy is bared to the world.

The Beachcomber—(TWO REELS)—ESSANAY—OCTOBER 31.—Featuring Harry Dunkinson, Virginia Bowker and Royal Douglas. A review appears elsewhere in this issue.

Canimated Nooz Pictorial No. 17.—ESSANAY—NOVEMBER 1.—Cartoon by Wallace A. Carlson. At Cheesecake, Pa., Andy Carnegia is caught by the Canimated Nooz camera man in the act of distributing a whole flock of hero medals. Simp Hoosis gets one for saving the half of the population from asphyxiation by eating a ton of limburger cheese. Gabby Talkalong saved the other half when she lost her voice, so she gets a medal, too. Canimated Nooz inaugurates a Pictograft section. The first number shows how huntsmen capture the Oola-boola bird, that society women of New York and Oshkosh may have hats trimmed with its rare eyebrows. The bird is caught off guard and a huge rock affixed to its tail. Then its capture is simple. Scenes about Crater Lake, Oregon, make up the five hundred feet of scenic. This odd lake lies in the hollow base of a volcanic cone.

The Heart of Virginia Keep—(THREE REELS)—ESSANAY—NOVEMBER 4.—Featuring Marguerite Clayton and Edward Arnold. Work has been started on the new moving picture theater to be erected on Greenfield avenue, between Fifty-fifth and Fifty-sixth avenues, West Allis. The building will be 48x80 feet and of brick construction. George E. Loebel is owner.

The Strand Theater Company, which conducts the Strand moving picture house, formerly the Amuse, in Madison, filed articles of incorporation in the office of Register of Deeds Field. The capital is $2,500 and the incorporators are Dr. William Gird Beecroft, R. W. Jackson and Patricia Osborne.

The Trio Theater in Marshfield has been opened by Mr. Kliner.

The Grand and Casino Theaters in Merrill have reopened under the management of B. F. Gripple and E. H. House.

The Empress Theater has been opened in Elkhorn.

The new picture house being built by Kliner, Lang & Scharman has opened its doors to the public of Marshfield. It is a model theater and has a seating capacity of 519 and is well lighted and ventilated. The building is fire proof and has side and end exits. It is called the Tri and will be managed by Emil Kliner.

The Trio Theater, Marshfield's newest motion picture house owned by Kliner, Lang & Scharmann has been opened. It is a roomy theater, with fine ventilation and plenty of exits. It seats 519 people and is managed by E. S. Kliner.

The new Empire Theater at Twentieth and Marshall streets, Manitowoc, opened on September 2. The building is fireproof and seats 500 people. Sylvester Goryeska is manager.

Film Chiefs Meet in Chicago

NEW BRANCH OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FORMED—NEW MEMBERS

ONE of the most important steps in the comprehensive national plan completely to organize the motion picture industry and the first action in creating a series of powerful, effectively formed units of the big central body, with headquarters in New York, were taken on November 3 when the chiefs of the big screen and film interests in Chicago met for the purpose of forming an advisory executive committee of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry.

To the layman this might carry no more significance than an ordinary trade announcement—and there are many in the business who may fail to realize the profound importance of this move following promptly on the announcement of the general plan only a few days ago. But it is the beginning of deep-foundation construction of a national character. The legislatures of thirty-eight states, shortly to be convened, are likely to take up measures of censorship, and, from these and other sources more or less powerful, the industry is faced with problems of defense and protection more numerous than at any time in the history of the business. These adverse activities can be met and overcome only by an organization, watchful, tirelessly aggressive for its rights, efficiently affiliated for the common good and the general betterment of the industry.

Chicago Branch Complete in Itself

The Chicago gathering furnished an illuminating illustration of the tremendous scheme of the projectors of the National Association, for, though the body formed in that city bears the name of an advisory committee, it is, in actual fact and operation a perfectly rounded, separate organization, functioned exactly as the parent body and embracing all of the fifty odd divisions of the National. With such men directing its activities as John R. Freuler, president of the Mutual; George K. Spoor, of the Essanay, and W. N. Selig, of the Selig Polyscope, and allied interests of the same relative power, the Illinois organization must take its place at once as a commanding force building and buttressing the industry.

Both the Illinois and the California branches were decided upon at the last meeting of the National, at which time Mr. Freuler, who had been offered the chairmanship of Illinois, had the matter under consideration. Since that time there has been an interchange between the head of the Mutual and President William A. Brady and Walter W. Irwin, chairman of the executive committee, with the result that a time was set for the meeting, and Frederick H. Elliott, the executive secretary, was instructed to go to Chicago to give direction in the formation of the body. Arrangements were made to have it as far as possible a representative meeting.

The Selig and the Essanay companies are among the original subscribers to the initial agreement of the National Association, and two members of the board of directors are located in Chicago—Maurice A. Choynski, of the Newberry Theater, representing the Exhibitors' Division, and Donald J. Bell, of the Bell and Howell Company, of the supplies and equipment division. Alfred Hamburger, manager of theatrical enterprises, is also a member of the National.

The producers will make a good showing, for besides the three big concerns mentioned, there will be all of the others. Among those on Mr. Freuler's notification list are William J. Dunn, president of the Eagle Film Manufacturing Company; W. R. Rothacker, president of the Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company; Frederick J. Ireland, president of the Emerald Motion Picture Company; Wilbur Dunham, president of the Sunbeam Motion Picture Company.

Correspondence from the Central West coming to the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry shows the liveliest interest in the work of the parent body and has revealed the pressing need of a compact organization willing to mingle enthusiasm with hard work and a right fraternal pull-together federation of interests. Executive Secretary Elliott left New York on the Twentieth Century Limited and immediately on his arrival at the headquarters that he had established at the Hotel Blackstone got in touch with the men who are to build the Illinois branch into one of the big, virile factors of the National Association.

New Firms Join National Association

Altogether six new divisions of high importance for the National Association are in the process of formation and eight producing companies have been received into membership.

The work of reaching and effectively canvassing all individuals and concerns embraced in the fifty odd classifications of membership entails an enormous amount of personal canvassing and a carefully carded correspondence system that covers every spot in the United States that is in any way related to the industry. It is a tremendous task, but such is the energy given to it and so wisely thought out the direction behind the effort that within a day after it was decided to establish the first Advisory Executive Committee in California there was established a perfect co-ordination between the work on the Pacific coast and the centralized activities here. The mail of Frederick H. Elliott, the executive secretary, and that of William M. Seabury, the general counsel of the association, has increased enormously within the last two weeks, showing how the country-wide campaign is bearing fruit.

The already impressive list of producers in the association has been augmented by the admission of the Keystone, Gaumont, Thanhouser, Arrow, Erbograph, Crystal, Niagara, Rolfe, McClure, Evans, Deseret, F. Powell Productions, U. S. M. P. Corp'n, Wharton, Inc., and Kalem.

The slide manufacturers of Greater New York and of Kansas City have organized and applied for charters, while the following sections are in the process of making, with the concerns embraced under each head:

Machine Manufacturers: The Nicholas Power Co., The Precision Machine Co., The Baird Co., Thomas A. Edison, Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Co. of Chicago, American Standard Motion Picture Machine Co., Wilboken Manufacturing Co. of Milwaukee, Coles Picture Machine Co.

Electric Light and Equipment: General Electric Co., Schenectady; Western Electric Co., New York; Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co., East Pittsburgh; Wagner Electric Company, St. Louis.

Lithographers: Acme, Alpha, Greenwich, H. C. Miner, Morgan Otis, Strobridge, J. H. Tooker Printing Co., Metro Lithograph Co., United States Printing Co.

Screen Manufacturers: Mirror Screen Co., Shelbyville, Ind.; J. H. Genter Co., Newburgh, N. Y.; Radium Gold Fibre Screen Co., New York.

Carbon Manufacturers: National Carbon Co., Cleveland; Hugo Resinger, N. Y.; Spear Carbon Co., St. Marys, Pa.

These proposed divisions are so nucleated that in these and those now being planned one or more concerns named already have membership in the National Association.

The Screen Manufacturers of Greater New York formed a temporary organization a few days ago and formally asked the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry for a charter. This group has established a high mark for rapid, well-directed and efficient effort. H. F. Coufal, of the Novelty Slide Co., has been the moving spirit in getting the men in his line inspired by the slogan, "Unity of Action Spells Screen Success," and beside having given much of his time to personal visits and talks, has carried on a correspondence that has reached the majority of the slide makers in the country. Others in this wide-awake division are:

F. A. Appelbaum, Novelty Slide Co.; Herbert Wyckoff and John J. West, Manhattan Slide and Film Co.; J. D. Scott and E. C. Van Altena, Scott & Van Altena; Miss Rose R. Schack, Commercial Slide and Film Service; A. L. Harston and B. J. Knoppleman, Excelsior Illustrating Co.; George Appel, Economy Slide Co.; Nat. Chersin and Mr. Rosenburg, Greater New York Slide Co.

The suggestions as to purpose and procedure made by Mr. Coufal will be followed with some modifications and amendments. In general they are as follows—the working plan being an excellent model for other organized units:

Standardization of the industry.

A mutual working agreement and co-operative arrangement.

An interchange of data regarding credits, employes and raw material houses.

Knowing your competitor as he is, and not as some one else describes him to you.

Standardization of prices with a fixed minimum.

The elimination of free samples and free original designs.

The elimination of free slides.

The elimination of useless and wasteful advertising.

The elimination of "knocking" and illegitimate competitive methods.

No interference with competitors' employes.

Duplicating and imitating another's design to be strictly prohibited.

Legitimate methods only to be employed in securing business.

All special discounts to be discontinued; terms 30 days net or 2% in ten days.

Total elimination of graft in any manner, presents and other contributions to the man who gives out the business.

Establishment of a general buying committee, with consequent saving to all members.

General advertising campaign, boosting "Made in New York" lantern slides.

All disputes or grievances to be properly presented for entire branch to be settled by majority vote.

Strict observance of all rules and regulations of this branch, as well as of the by-laws and constitution of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry.

A general circular letter and pamphlet to be prepared for mailing to the trade, setting forth the high cost of material and labor entering into the manufacture of slides and showing that the increase in the cost of slides is absolutely necessary in order for the companies producing same to exist.

This branch will receive all necessary support and assistance from the "parent" body and the members of the organization will favor members of this branch with their business.

This branch to hold its own individual and separate meetings; discuss and settle its own affairs; regulate its own conditions; pass its own rules and regulations and conduct the branch as if it were a distinct body, though affiliated with the National Organization. The Board of Directors of the National Organization will support this branch and help to enforce its proper views.

No rebating, price refunding, special discounts, or other knifing methods to be tolerated. Books and records of all members to be subject to examination by a committee of men in other lines of the industry or verifying any reports.

This branch is to have representation by at least one member in the general body, and on the Board of Directors of the National Association. Members of this branch are to meet at least once a month. Each company will have but one vote, and one authorized representative, although a representative of any company may attend the general meetings of this branch.

The organization of the actors' division has been set in motion and when its executive committee is named it will appear to be the announcement of an all-star cast representing many thousands of dollars. They, too, will plainly outline purpose and policy and become, at once, the most pictorially effective unit in the great family of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry.

Cincinnati Amusements Merge

Theatrical and moving picture competition in the exclusive Avondale district of Cincinnati ended when the complete merger of the interests of I. Joseph Lamping, J. W. Mahan and Charles Schaengold was finally effected. The three control, among other important theatrical interests, the Arcade and the Forest theaters, and other amusement places. A new corporation is to be formed at once, with Charles Schaengold as president, I. W. McMahan as vice-president and F. Joseph Lamping as secretary and treasurer.

The new deal provides for the absolute merger of interests for a period of five years. It is stated that the new merger may be considerably enlarged so as to include all first-class motion picture theaters.

The Unity Sales Corporation has opened offices in Dallas, Texas, in the heart of the film district, at 1911½ Commerce street, with Francis J. Gilbert behind the "mahogany." Mr. Gilbert is well known to southwestern exhibitors, having been one of the first independent exchangemen in the territory, with the All Star productions several years ago. He also exploited the world-famous "Cabiria" throughout the Southwest.

"FIFTY-FIFTY (Triangle), with Norma Talmadge, was played to excellent business. A good number of dramatic scenes with a climax which works out just as an audience wishes it, makes this an excellent attraction."—S. "Pauline Frederick in ASHES OF EMBERS. A wonderful actress in a wonderful picture. The story holds up its interest. Photography and details are excellent. Played to big audiences who seemed to be satisfied."—L. A. Cuneo, manager De Luxe Theater.—Catering to a class of educated people of a critical type.

"The Scarlet Oath, with Gail Kane (World). The story of the picture is laid in Russia and is old stuff rehashed. Patrons, however, seemed to be satisfied. If patrons want and like poison, why not feed it to them?" —S. Trinz, manager Covent Garden Theater.—Neighborhood theater; catering to the better classes.

"A Wife's Sacrifice, with Robert B. Mantell (Fox). A very good picture with a star who unfortunately is not yet well enough known to have any particularly strong drawing power. Patrons seemed to be satisfied."—M. Cutler, manager Strand Theater.—Located on one of the principal outlying business streets; catering to a middle class.

"The Lash, featuring Marie Doro (Paramount). While the star has no particularly strong drawing power, the returns on this picture conclusively proved the effect of a clever title. All in all, a very good picture, holding up the interest to the last."—L. A. Cuneo, manager De Luxe Theater.—Catering to a class of educated people of a critical type.

"Romeo and Juliet, (Fox), featuring Theda Bara and Harry Hilliard. A first-class production which seemed to be a trifle over the people's heads. The picture undoubtedly is beautiful. The big and artistic sets were really wonderful. I heard many compliments paid to both the stars by people leaving my theater."—Harry Miller, manager Boston Theater.—Downtown house.

"Theodore Roberts featured in Anton the Terrible (Lasky). The title of this picture leads one to believe it contains some highly dramatic scenes and tense moments when in reality it is a very tame picture. The plot is obscure and the story drags. Not at all well received by patrons."—L. A. Cuneo, manager De Luxe Theater.—Catering to a class of educated people of a critical type.

"Somewhere in France (Triangle), featuring Howard Hickman and Louise Glaum. A very good picture which I fear was a bit 'high-browish' and vague, which I think can only be appreciated by those who have read the short story of the same name which appeared in one of the popular fiction magazines."—S. Trinz, manager Covent Garden Theater.—Neighborhood theater; catering to the better classes.

"A Diplomatic Service, featuring Francis X. Bushman and Beverley Bayne (Metro). The story in this picture is somewhat of a disappointment, it being perceptibly disconnected at various points. Business, however, was very good, as is always the case with these stars. I hope these stars will be given better vehicles to work in in the future."—Harry Miller, manager The Boston Theater.—Downtown house.

"Clara Kimball Young in The Common Law. She is just what the doctor ordered. When you can charge twenty-five cents on Madison street and hold them out, you can safely figure that you are getting away with something. If ever I made a clean-up on a picture, this was it. Am I going to book her next release? Come over and see me after I have shown 'The Foolish Virgin.'"—Harry Miller, manager Boston Theater.—Downtown house.

"The Dawn Maker, with William S. Hart (Triangle). As a whole is only fair. The climax in the closing scenes of this picture were not what my audience expected or wished to see. While the picture held interest, my patrons were not over-enthusiastic about it. More pictures of this same type, I fear, will jeopardize this star's drawing power, which now is really great."—M. Cutler, manager Strand Theater.—Located on one of the principal outlying business streets; catering to a middle class.

"The Chattel, with E. H. Sothern (Vitagraph). I have a definite opinion as regards the drawing power of a legitimate stage star compared with a motion picture star with a reputation gained through work in pictures. This is the only fault I can find with this picture. With a few more good pictures of this kind this star undoubtedly will improve as a box office attraction. The picture as a whole is fair and in keeping with Vitagraph's standard."—S. Trinz, manager Covent Garden Theater.—Neighborhood theater; catering to the better classes.

"Philip Holden—Waster, featuring Richard Bennett (Mutual), played to disappointed audiences at my theater, largely due to the fact that something heavy was expected from the star, who made such a remarkable success in "Damaged Goods," in which he portrayed one of the important parts. This picture is in the common class of five-reelers. This, coupled with a very poor name, I fear worked to our detriment."—L. A. Cuneo, manager De Luxe Theater.—Catering to a class of educated people of a critical type.

"The Wolf Woman (Triangle), featuring Louise Glaum, was issued under a pink permit. The theme of the picture is of the ordinary type. It, however, contains a number of scenes which are extremely startling. The star portrays the role of vampire in the proscribed finished style of an artist. The story is woven around a woman with a stone-cold heart, destruction following her wherever she goes. This is followed by her own downfall and ultimate discard to the heap of fallen women, making a very fitting climax and convincing moral."—M. Cutler, manager Strand Theater.—Located on one of the principal outlying business streets; catering to a middle class.

William E. Shay With Brenon

Herbert Brenon has engaged William E. Shay for a leading role in "The Queen Mother," which will be his next contribution to Selznick Pictures, and in which Florence Reed will be starred. Shay has appeared in nearly all of the big productions which Brenon has made, his last work under this director being as leading man in Fox's "A Daughter of the Gods," now running at the Lyric Theater, New York. Other Brenon pictures in which Shay has worked were "Neptune's Daughter," "Heart of Maryland," "The Clemenceau Case," "The Two Orphans," "The Kreutzer Sonata," and "Sin." Previous to this he had several years stage experience, and worked for the camera in Paris, Berlin and Vienna, where he gained an insight into the subtle methods of the European pantomimists. When it was found that there was no role in "War Brides" suitable for Mr. Shay, he declined to consider any offers of engagements from other producers, preferring to wait for the next Brenon production. In "The Queen Mother," he will have the role opposite Miss Reed—that of a proud duke of medieval Italy.

The Public Must Be Educated

MARY GRAY PECK FORESHADOWS FUTURE OF BETTER FILMS FOR CHILDREN

By B. F. Barrett.

THE children have had champions before to fight for them in the cause of proper films for their entertainment in the motion picture theaters, in fact there are a number of people working in their behalf all over the country in a small way—in a community, a city or even a state. Now from out of the east comes an advocate who is making her plea nation-wide—a missionary who is trying to educate the public to demand the right kind of films for children so that the producers and exhibitors will have to meet that demand.

This champion is Mary Gray Peck, who is representing the Motion Picture Committee of the General Federation of Women's Clubs and the National Committee on Better Films for Young People (affiliated with the National Board of Review). Miss Peck has been making a tour of the cities bordering on the Great Lakes and striving to arouse the interest of the public in better films—and especially good films for the young people.

Miss Peck believes that if the public can be properly educated the question of censorship will no longer be agitating the whole country. She advocates the children's program as the first step in this fight against unjust censorship—and states that the special performances for the children are the forerunners—the seeds from which the family program will spring. She believes that the family program will be the ultimate solution of the whole problem of censorship of motion pictures. As the result of her study of the conditions in the different cities and states Miss Peck has found that the exhibitors all over the country are just beginning to wake up to the possibilities and the future of these programs for the children. The mothers and teachers are working for this cause—they want the children to see the right kind of pictures and they are willing to work for this end. The only thing left to make these entertainments universally a part of the regular program in every motion picture theater is to educate the public until they will realize the value of the right kind of motion pictures for the rising generation.

"When I say special programs for children," said Miss Peck, "I mean the child under twelve. If these programs are made interesting enough I believe they will keep the children out of the houses in the evening. The youngsters will have all the pictures they want and will not be so anxious to go again at night. It is the parents' fault that the children attend the evening performances and if the parents care to take their children to see the lurid plays they are at liberty to do so—except in cities where there is a strict censorship over films that are allowed to be shown only under the debarring sign of 'No Children admitted'—and they will do so until they are educated to such an extent that they appreciate and demand a higher standard of pictures for their children.

"It would be foolish for me to come from the east and attempt to tell the people throughout the middle west states what should make up these children's programs for that depends entirely upon the neighborhood and what the people want—that is a point for the individual exhibitor to find out. I will say, however, that for the children of this age my idea is to have a variety of subjects shown with the longest picture not more than two reels. I do not believe in giving them only educational films for they need to be amused also.

"The children over twelve can be taken care of by showing them the same program as the older people with the sex interest eliminated. They are ready for the family program, and in this program will be found, as I have stated before, the ultimate solution of this question of the child and the motion picture theater and the solution of the censorship question, for the family program will contain nothing that it is necessary to censor.

"The motion picture is the democratic form of drama. Its cheapness was, and still is, the original virtue of the 'movie.' It has furnished a form of amusement in which the whole family is interested. It has supplied a pleasure which the parents and children can enjoy together. When it is known that the motion picture theater is primarily and fundamentally a family amusement, that it is the one place where the parents and children can come together and be amused at the same time, that it is the one pleasure which the entire family can afford to enjoy because of the small expense involved—why not build up on this basic value of the motion picture and make the neighborhood theater a family house? When the program is made so that the whole family can come and the mothers will know that their children are not going to be shown anything objectionable, but at the same time the older people also are going to enjoy every picture, then the motion picture theater is going to reach the height of its value as a public entertainment, as an educational factor and a cementer of family ties. The family program will not necessarily mean a new and unusual output by the film companies, it will simply mean the exhibitor choosing his program with a view to pleasing everyone and in many instances simply a little cutting here and there of objectionable scenes from an otherwise splendid film, but still retaining all the thrills, all the interest, all the value of the picture. It will also mean the producing of many more of the higher class of pictures by the manufacturer. I have discovered in my tour that there is a growing number of these so-called family theaters, and—to prove that they are what the public wants and will prove the ultimate solution of this problem—I have found that the family theaters are the ones which are flourishing all over the country. It is the house which has been devoted to pink slip plays, or which has been showing these to a great extent that is being closed down for lack of support.

"I find that in almost all cases the exhibitors are willing to give these special programs for children if they see there is a desire for them on the part of their patrons. As yet they are not starting them voluntarily but are glad to co-operate with the mothers and clubwomen in this matter. They must please the public and the women constitute a very large proportion of the motion picture public.

"The chief objections raised by the exhibitors in connection with these special performances is that the mothers do not support them as they should. They are too liable not to send the children after the manager has tried to please them. They keep the children home on the slighest excuse although the manager has prepared and paid for a program for them. The managers claim in many cases these special performances are not profitable—in fact are a loss. Yet in some cities exhibitors are charging only two and three cents admission and are making money. It would seem that this question of profit lies with the individual manager and his method of conducting these special matinees. Many of the theatermen claim that they would not care if they just cleared expenses on these performances because they bring the results which are hard to obtain in any other way. For example they gain the good will and interest of the community and also they bring to the house the better class of people. They raise the standard of the house and interest the more intellectual and higher class of people—the class to which the exhibitor wants to cater.

"A universal complaint of the exhibitors is that they cannot find enough films suitable for the children. One way to take care of this would be a central exchange in which could be handled all the films which are suitable for the juvenile programs so that the exhibitor would be aided in his effort and would know just where to go to find what he wanted. And I believe that the time is coming when there will be a library of films for children just as there is now a section of shelves devoted to literature for children in every public library.

"Another difficulty which the managers anticipate is that they have contracted for a program and will have to pay extra for these films for children, and the revenue realized does not merit such expenditure. If there is a great enough demand for these films they will be supplied and the program contract will include each week the films to make up this special performance for the children. With the open booking plan, of course, the exhibitor is free to get his films where he will."

The question was asked: You have said these special programs allow the exhibitor to cater to the better class of people. What of the poorer class and the less intellectual people? Does no one want to cater to them. Surely they need the amusement more than the others for they have so few amusements.

"That is true," replied Miss Peck, "and it is for this very class of people that the motion pictures have done more good than any other. They have been drawn away from the undesirable pleasures which they found in the saloons, and dance halls, and even worse places, and have been attracted to the motion picture theater. They crave thrills and have asked for sexual pictures. They clamor for the film with the sexual appeal because it is the only one they know which will give them the desired excitement and sensation. They do not know any other kinds exist which will gratify them. All they want is excitement and they will be pleased with the purer kind of sensationalism if it is given to them. They can gradually be educated out of this abnormal desire but until then better give them the thrills they ask for in the pictures than allow them to sink back into the licentious pleasures which they have had before. With the present supply there is not much choice in thrills, they must either be of the sex type or the fighting and gun play class. But for these people if they cannot be held by a really good picture then I would sanction giving them the poorer class as long as they are not obscene—give them fights and hair breadth escapes and wonderful adventures.

"As a matter of fact the people of this strata considered mentally are not more than children and the rules which would apply to the child of from fourteen to eighteen would apply to them—for their intellectual development is often no greater than the child of fourteen. They have left school at the fourth or fifth grade and gone to work—and their work is of the mechanical, machine-like kind which serves rather to further stunt their intellects than to develop them. They know few pleasures and these are generally of the lowest order—they are abnormally developed along these lines. If they must have the picture with a thrill give it to them, but at the same time gradually make these pictures better and better until they have been unconsciously educated. The very fact that they now come to see the pictures in preference to their former means of amusement is a step in advance in their education toward better things. Eventually without realizing it they will be educated—and with no effort on their part their standards will be raised.

"This problem of better films for the young people is really a neighborhood problem. It must be met and handled in the community by the people composing that community. The people to whom we must look for this work are the mothers, teachers and clubwomen. In every case it is the women who have shown the exhibitor the value of these programs. The fact that there are 380 cities and towns in the United States which we know of, now showing children's programs—and this means a number of theaters in each one of these towns, Cleveland alone having twenty-five—shows what the women have already accomplished along this line.

"The manufacturers will produce what the public demands—they are compelled to or there will be no market for their wares. The exhibitor will give the people of his neighborhood what they want because he must cater to their desires or lose their patronage. It evolves, then, upon the public to demand what they want—and the public must be educated to want the right kind of films. Let each community contribute their small part toward this great whole—let them see that the portion of the public of which they are a part is properly educated along this line and the time will come—and it is not far distant—when the supply of films suitable for the children will equal the demand, and the motion picture theaters running children's matinees or family programs will be the general rule and not the exception.

"The producers say they are willing to do their part to help this movement, the exhibitors claim they are anxious to begin—and I believe they are sincere in their statements. The matter, then, rests with the public—they will get what they want. Do they want suitable pictures for the young people? Do they want the family program?"

Universal Director Lloyd Carleton is filming "Of Such Is the Kingdom of Heaven," in five reels.

"So Shall Ye Reap" is the name of a Selig production to be released Monday, November 6, in General Film Service. The name has been changed from "As Ye Sow." The production, "So Shall Ye Reap" is of unusual excellence according to advance reviews.

What Theater Men Are Doing

AN OPEN FORUM

This is a department of, by and for exhibitors. We want YOU represented here. Other managers and proprietors of picture theaters want to hear YOUR experiences, your opinions and your advice. Write to this department telling us your story, how you started, how you grew and all about your theater and how you manage it. Mention your advertising methods and your lobby displays. If possible send in photographs of yourself and your house. Address, The Forum, Motography, Chicago.

EVERY once in a while an exhibitor appears who evolves some new angle to the business and who takes more than ordinary care in working out his ideas. Needless to say, such a showman is always successful, unless the conditions under which he labors are abnormal.

Because he believes that "picture parties" would be just as popular as "theater parties" if people knew what programs were to be shown at picture houses as far in advance as they know what stage plays are coming to theaters, Robert W. Hickman, manager of the Lyric, of Greenville, Illinois, has instituted an innovation in programs. Under the title of "A Glimpse Into the Future," Mr. Hickman has issued a quarterly program, which contains a list of the daily feature releases at his house from September 21, 1916, to January 1, 1917.

The programs are printed on heavy paper of attractive color. Mr. Hickman believes that his patrons will keep them, and will refer to them in planning "picture" parties weeks in advance. He also thinks it will stimulate interest generally. For his serial number, Mr. Hickman is running "The Secret of the Submarine," recently made by the American Film Corporation.

"Jerry, the Picture Fan"

The Photoplay News, published by the motion picture interests of Rochester, New York, has created a popular character called "Jerry, the Picture Fan," who writes his personal impressions of pictures. The Colonial Theater of Rochester has just inaugurated a cartoon contest based upon "Jerry." "Jerry lives on Cobbs Hill and is ex-officio its Mayor," says Photoplay News. "His downtown habitat is the Colonial Theater, wherein he exchanges confidences with the ushers, cashier and manager, all of which are duly reported each week in the Photoplay News. Jerry speaks for himself, however. He needs no exploitation. Some there be, however, who do not like his picture. So Manager A. N. Wolff of the Colonial is willing to give all local cartoonists an opportunity to embody their conception of the Mayor of Cobbs Hill, and to offer suitable prizes for the winners."

A season pass to the Colonial Theater will be given to the winner of the cartoon contest. A second prize of a pass, good at the Colonial Theater for six months is offered. A third prize of a pass to the Colonial Theater, good for three months, is offered. A fourth prize, an annual subscription to the Photoplay News is offered. If suitable work is submitted, four selections will be made and the four different conceptions of Jerry will be given to the public. Each contestant can submit as many cartoons as he wishes and they will be returned at the end of the contest, November 15, when the awards are made.

These judges have been selected to pick the winners: John Scott Clubb of the Rochester Herald, the dean of Rochester cartoonists; Francis De Foy of the Lyddon-Hanford Company; Clinton G. Fish of Fish, Lyman & Goodwin Company; Fred Manning of L. B. Elliott Company, and Manager A. N. Wolff of the Colonial Theater.

A Striking Presentation

By A. R. M. Sutton

The Liberty Theater of Seattle, which has gained quite a reputation in that vicinity for its unusual and effective presentation of features, scored a hit with William S. Hart's "The Return of Draw Egan."

One of Manager von Herberg's favorite ways of getting atmosphere and thus the attention of the audience from the very beginning is through lighting effects combined with the interpretative music. When this picture opened with the big gun fight in the streets, all the lights in the house were turned out, and

In the recent presentation of "Manhattan Madness" by the Liberty Theater of Seattle, Advertising Manager Gordon F. Fullerton outdid himself in cleverly conceived advertising. On big half page advertisements in the newspapers on the opening Sunday he placed the good-naturedly-grinning life-size portrait of Douglas Fairbanks and a lot of clever words, together with the program of the Sunday noon concert. The result on that first night is shown above.

the Wurlitzer orchestra kept pace with the fusilade of shots being fired on the screen. Again at the beginning of the street duel between Egan and the bandit the theater was darkened and the flash of the revolvers on the screen was made more realistic by the orchestra's cannonading. In several other scenes changes in lighting was employed to enhance the effect, and the people left the theater feeling that they had lived through the story.

"Manhattan Madness" was also presented at the Liberty with unusual effects.

Announcement of New Management

When the present management took over the Triangle Theater, at 7219 Wentworth avenue, Chicago, they printed the following announcement attractively in old English on a separate slip and enclosed it in the program.

IF IT'S GOOD WE SHOW IT

TRIANGLE THEATER

7219 WENTWORTH AVENUE. NOW UNDER NEW MANAGEMENT.

You, as a resident in this vicinity, will be interested to know that the Triangle Theater is now under new management, being controlled by experienced theatrical men. The pick of the world's photoplays will be shown. No expense will be spared to make this theater the leading photoplay house in this neighborhood, and we shall look for a continuation of your patronage. It is our ambition to present motion pictures that will please you, and we would be pleased to receive suggestions as to the class of subjects you find most entertaining.

School Show a Success

Here was a performance especially for school children which was a very decisive success, according to the Garfield Booster. The show was held at the Star, Garfield, Kansas. The newspaper account is refreshing. It follows:

"Rip Van Winkle" was given at the Star Monday afternoon to the largest audience that has attended any of the school performances. "Rip" was in five parts. The picture was beautifully tinted and excellent photography was evident throughout. Joseph Jefferson, who played the part of "Rip" gave what was perhaps the best characterization of any that the writer has ever had the privilege of witnessing. During the course of the hour and a half's entertainment "Rip" disposed of 1213 good sized drinks of "Old Dutch" booze—and he never staggered once. O'Raghilly, who was operating the machine, got so dry that he went down to the Hotel Garfield and drank the contents of three fire extinguishers. But at that it was a mighty interesting picture. To a person experienced in lip reading the remarks of Mrs. Rip to Nick Vedder and old Von Beekman were quite enlightening. It had something to do with a ham sandwich and a cup of coffee after they were through with that scene—we didn't catch the rest.

Pictorial versions of old-time classics, providing they followed the text of the stories literally, would not be fit to look at. "Rip Van Winkle" was not suggestive in any part of it, and as an animated version of the story did very well. The kids enjoyed it—and the old folks, too. Let us have more of them.

An Invitation to Criticism

The Regent of Philadelphia, "a theater of first presentations," managed by Lionel H. Keene, is a splendid house and the management is earnest in giving the finest possible service to its patrons. The appeal carried on the last page of its program is worthy of study by other managers. It follows.

STUDY—ABSORB—CRITICISE—COMPARE

That's what we would like to have you do with every play that we present to you. We've left no stone unturned and neglected no effort to secure and offer the very best in photoplays. If, after careful comparison, you can suggest possible improvement, we should like to have the benefit of your ideas.

Every day we are receiving many letters of appreciation from our patrons which always prove a source of much pleasure to the management. One writes: "The unique lighting effects, the appropriate music, and the perfect photography, not to forget the courteous ushers in their very novel uniforms, made it seem as though I were living in a real dream."

Another said: "The Regent is surely the most beautiful and artistic theater in Philadelphia; the music a delight; the screen a triumph and the pictures the best ever."

We are constantly striving to give you a perfect program of photo plays and music, and service unequalled anywhere.

"The Sunbeam," will be the name of Mabel Taliaferro's next Metro wonderplay. Miss Taliaferro will play the part of a girl who brings sunshine to the lives of all those with whom she comes in contact. Some of the leading scenes are laid in a candy factory.

The musical program receives especial attention at the Regent. It might be of interest to our patrons to know that.

A new and large stage has been built by the Christie brothers at their studio to accommodate the company headed by Pathe Lehrman, who will make comedies for release on the Fox program.

Screenshine

By Mel Ody

VERILY, the ways of the censor are devious and curtained in mystery. But once in a while some stroke of fate turns the Cooper-Hewitts onto his mental processes and we understand.

For instance, the Reverend Festus Foster of the Kansas State Board of Nonsensers murders right and left any film in which people appear who are afflicted with anything like sex—unless said affliction happens to expose itself in the form of a kiss. No matter how scarlet or white hot the kiss may be—no matter if it is 80 feet long—he never kicks a bit.

The reason has just jumped out of the bag. The Rev. Foster was the champion kisser of his college. And while enjoying the sight of a particularly punchful kiss last week, in a burst of enthusiasm he admitted that he once smacked thirteen girls in one evening.

Moral: Choose the censors who've been there

Ralph Kettering, of Jones, Linick and Schaefer, the wholesale Chicago exhibitors, has just proved a theory held by only a very small minority of people, viz.: the P. A. has moments of real sanity. He has written a playlet, "After Ten Years," which is now turning 'em away at the Chicago Hippodrome.

A BIRD OF A ROLE!

You old actors, what would you do if you received this order: "Makeup for Peacocke." Ed Brady of Universal got it and spent all day hunting around for feathers. Finally he learned that Peacocke is a new U. director.

"The honor of your presence is requested at the luncheon and reception to be tendered to Mr. Pete Montebello, at the Hotel Claridge, New York, on Monday at one o'clock."

This was the invitation received a few days ago by all the prominent press and film people of Manhattan.

Many expected to meet face to face with Italy's or France's most celebrated star. But a far more interesting experience was in store for them.

For Pete is an unshaved chimpanzee.

PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN AFFECTS MOVIES

Here's the biggest joke that has happened in the fifth largest industry this week.

Upon his triumphal exit from a New York house where a w. k. film star has been upon exhibition during the evening, an earnest man with a large Adam's apple hollered "I wish you'd run for president!"

"HAVE YOU A LITTLE REELER IN YOUR HOME?"

We submit the above head as the cream of all press agent dope created this week. Many can throw the bull but few can handle the heifer. Charley Meyer's corner of Paramount wins the cake.

HE WANTS A CHANGE

We hate to suggest that the Illinois exhibitor who has placed a fountain containing real fish in his foyer has probably had suckers there before.

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

HERE'S a good example in regard to how to take care of your employes. The Strand of New York has installed a billiard and reading room in its basement and fitted it up in fine style.

The Women's Clubs of Upper Montclair, New Jersey, held a meeting to protest against the establishment of a motion picture theater in their town.

The day after Lawrence & Bowman, proprietors of the Oak Theater, Oakdale, Nebraska, opened their house a fire which started from an electric wire destroyed the equipment of the theater.

The Colonial Theater of Urbana, Illinois, has been taken over by R. R. Harmeson, who is planning to redecorate the house completely. This nice little 500 seater was formerly piloted by L. L. McCullough.

Thirty theater men, members of the Columbus, Ohio, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, have agreed to show slides on their screens citing reasons why the $3,500,000 flood protection bonds should be voted.

George Balsdon, Jr., has been appointed assistant manager of the New York branch of the Vitagraph-V. L. S. E., to succeed A. N. Webster, who has been promoted to the management of the St. Louis branch.

A resolution approving the Kansas censorship of motion pictures and the work being done by the National Public Welfare League was recently passed by unanimous vote of the Kansas Baptist state convention there.

Lee A. Ochs, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, has purchased a new theater now in the course of construction in Fordham, New York (part of New York City). The house will open on November 11.

Children under 16 years of age are prohibited from attending moving picture theaters, churches or public gatherings at Oklahoma City in an order issued by the local health officials in an effort to prevent the spread of infantile paralysis.

Manager Stanley Mastbaum of the Stanley Theater, Philadelphia, was the host last week to Mayor and Mrs. Thomas B. Smith and party, and Director of Public Safety William Wilson and party, when the films of the Philadelphia Firemen's School were shown.

The first frolic of the Cleveland Screen Club was given recently at the Olmsted Hotel. Members of the "Alone at Last" company playing at the Colonial Theater were in attendance. A supper was served at eleven o'clock and a cabaret entertainment provided.

Joseph Allman, a prominent exhibitor of Illinois, who now owns the Avon Theater at Decatur, is spending a clean $65,000 on a new house at Monticello, Illinois. Nothing will be omitted that will make the new picture palace up-to-the-minute. It is to seat 1,000.

The Kansas City Screen Club, with rooms at 15 West Tenth street, holds its regular business meetings the last Tuesday of each month. Every Friday night is set aside for Ladies' Night and every Tuesday evening there is a stag smoker and business meeting at 10:30 p. m.

The Rand Theater of Troy, New York, which has been closed for several months, has been reopened. The house has been taken over by Harry Hall, who also operates the Plaza and other theaters in Troy. Paramount service will be used. "The Love Mask" was the opening feature.

In Macon, Georgia, there is a successful motion picture theater catering exclusively to the colored people, and according to report, it is a credit to the race. There are, in addition, two regular motion picture houses and a third, the Capitol, will be opened shortly. Business is declared to be good.

Dr. A. J. Dix, manager of the Gale Theater, Mitchell, S. D., held a Sunday show for the first time on October 8. The opening was to test the Sunday motion picture law of South Dakota. Mr. Dix was brought before Judge William Herbert of the municipal court and pleaded not guilty.

Manager Riddle of the Bertha Theater, Chicago, has put on a rather novel stunt of advertising Mary Pickford in "Hulda From Holland." He has two wooden shoes in a window with one quart or so of beans in them, and is giving a prize to the ones who can guess how many beans are in Hulda's shoes.

Manager Landau of Belleville, Illinois, a short time ago engineered a "Word Guessing Contest" of "How many words could be made out of the title, Paramount Pictures." The first prize was won by Mr. Keiner, principal of the Humboldt School, Belleville, who got 3,778 words out of the seventeen letters.

One of the biggest motion picture contracts in the history of the industry was closed in Portland, Maine, when Sam Harris, of the vaudeville-motion picture circuit of Ackerman & Harris, obtained the first-run exhibition rights for the Portland Hippodrome and 16 other houses of the circuit for Pathe features.

Asking the State authorities to keep "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in film form out of Ohio, the Daughters of the Confederacy, in session at Dayton, Ohio, passed a resolution. Delegates declared the Harriet Beecher Stowe story is being prepared for the screen and will have a disquieting effect upon the mind of the film patron.

The 1400 "guests" at Clinton prison, at Dannemora, New York, were recently given a special showing of "The Battle Cry of Peace" and one of them claims to have been converted by the film. The feature was loaned gratis to the warden by F. F. Hartisch, manager of the Syracuse Vitagraph exchange.

Otto Stelzner, proprietor of the Star Theater, North Minneapolis, is drumming up a good deal of business by means of his scheme of placing an Autola on his automobile and driving the machine up and down the streets playing various bugle calls. He says his Saturday night business has been greatly improved by this plan.

A deal was consummated recently whereby the United Film Corporation absorbed the Associated Film Company at Kansas City, Missouri. G. B. Howard, manager of the Associated, remains in same capacity with the new organization, with offices at 319-25 Cloyd building. C. L. Potter, late with the Universal, will be special representative.

The possibility that motion picture houses of Butte City, Montana, will have to pay a definite license graded in accordance with the seating capacities of their respective places of business was uncovered in the last city council meeting. The ordinance also provides that the houses must be fumigated at least once weekly or pay a fine of from $10 to $300.

D. W. Griffith's massive spectacle, "Intolerance," is breaking records on the Pacific Coast. In San Francisco, where it is being shown at the Columbia Theater, the second week's receipts were $3,000 in excess of the biggest week of "The Birth of a Nation," which up to the time of Griffith's "Intolerance" had been a record-breaker.

Renewed vigilance on the part of the Ohio censors in enforcing their dictates is seen in instructions to Cleveland officers to report all instances where exhibitors fail to use the regulation length of censorship leaders on film: "Passed by the Ohio Board of Censors." Every Cleveland exhibitor has recently had a caller in this connection.

A meeting was held at the Unique Theater, Minneapolis, Minnesota, on October 24, at 10 o'clock in the morning, at which about four hundred motion picture people were present and were addressed by the mayoralty candidates on the censorship question. They were assured by both of them that a censor board would not be a part of their regime were they to be elected to office.

W. D. Ross, state superintendent of public instruction of Kansas, has placed the censor's hand on the public utterances of Candidate Charles E. Hughes. Statements made by the Republican candidate for President against the alleged un-American censorship of moving pictures and to be shown in a political film will not appear on Kansas screens, according to a ruling made by the state superintendent.

The Kenosha Board of Education voted to start a movement to eliminate showing of "abnormal and sensational" motion pictures in Kenosha, declaring that the statements "For Adults Only" and "None Under 21 Years Admitted" were simply to catch girls and boys. The board sent a protest to every theater in the city and have declared that if legislation is not passed by the council, an appeal will be made to the district attorney to suppress sensational shows.

There is a movement on foot in San Francisco to increase the admission prices to motion picture shows by at least five cents. The increased cost of films was given as the reason for this contemplated increase. It was remarked that in Los Angeles the theaters are charging up to thirty cents for admission with an average of fifteen cents for afternoon shows. Ten cents for matinees and fifteen to twenty-five cents for night performances will probably be the new schedule in Frisco.

E. D. Foy has been running the Columbia Theater, a beautiful suburban house in Dallas, for the past several months and making things hum in that part of town. He got the bug and now his "string" is started with another house, a beauty, too, the Rex, a little nearer town than his Columbia. Some one said the profits from the Columbia bought the Rex—if so, probably his combined profits will now start buying all the other suburban houses in Dallas—for Foy is a hustler.

The Liberty Theater at Houston, Texas, under the guidance of H. C. Norfleet, is one of the first theaters, if not the first, in the Southwest to put on a serial, continued from day to day. On the first of October Mr. Norfleet opened with "Gloria's Romance," running the first four chapters. A program like this was used for three days; then the next four chapters were put on. When the first episodes were put on, a "Billie Burke Serial" ticket-book, good for the entire serial, was sold at 50c. The venture was profitable, even though it was second-run.

A theater that can make the appeal of absolute cleanliness certainly has one very strong lever on the good will of the public. A good expression of this appeal is run on the programs of the Queen and Majestic Theaters, Wilmington, Delaware:

CLEANLINESS

We are just as particular in keeping you well as we are in booking the best plays. Cleanliness is an unbreakable rule at both the Queen and Majestic Theaters. We take from 7:30 to 11:30 every day to put these theaters in the spick and span condition you have the right to demand. For your health's sake as well as your pleasure, you should go to the QUEEN and MAJESTIC.

Prosperity Day was celebrated on the streets of Dallas, Texas, some days ago. The celebrators were mostly exhibitors, among whom were Geo. Stephens of Sulphur Springs, E. J. Lamkin of Greenville, S. A. Newman of Greenville, Wm. Poitzer of San Antonio, J. J. Hegman of Temple, Chas. St. Clair of Corsicana, Thos. Gaines of Hillsboro, Miss Betty Fairchild of Sherman, T. A. Hubbard of Sweetwater, Henry Cotter of Ft. Worth, Wm. Batsell of Sherman, Jim Wilson of Sherman, L. M. Ridout of Denison, W. W. Furnell of Quanah, D. C. Feegles of Fort Worth and A. Dillon of Fort Worth. The celebration was not in the form of a banquet or anything like that, but nevertheless every one was celebrating the gradual rise in box office receipts at picture shows all over the Southwest. And cotton keeps rising!

Trade Paper Circulations

THE motion picture industry has taken another step toward a solid business basis. The men who spend the advertising appropriations of the trade have organized under the name of the Association of Motion Picture Advertisers. They are making demands upon the trade paper publishers for actual data as to what they are buying in the circulation line.

These demands should have been made months ago. The industry would have saved thousands of dollars had this been done.

Some of the trade paper publishers in the motion picture field insult the intelligence of the manufacturers and distributors in the business by circulation claims so extravagant as to show on their face that they are untrue.

The publisher of one motion picture trade paper makes a circulation claim of 22,000 copies weekly. He goes even further by declaring that it is class circulation. This claim is made in the face of the fact that there are not more than 17,000 motion picture theaters open today in the United States and Canada, the natural circulation ground for a trade paper published in the United States. The publisher making these claims has printed in his own publication a statement that four and five copies of his magazine may be seen in a single theater. Manufacturers and distributors know from experience that exhibitors are not throwing away money to the extent of purchasing four and five copies of the same magazine.

Another publisher of a trade paper has made a statement in his columns that he believes there are about 14,000 motion picture theaters doing business in the United States. In the face of his own figures he claims a circulation of 12,000 copies, or practically 85 per cent of the houses he says are running.

Such circulation claims as these may be believed for a short time, but there must be a day of reckoning. And the advertising men say that day of reckoning has arrived.

MOTOGRAPHY is heartily in favor of anything that will put the motion picture business on a safe, sane, economical basis. The publishers of MOTOGRAPHY have proven this several times in the past by throwing open their circulation books to advertisers, in order to substantiate their claim of 9,300 class circulation. MOTOGRAPHY was the first, and so far as we know is today the only exclusive motion picture trade journal willing to back its circulation claims by open investigation.

In the past, motion picture manufacturers and distributors, instead of seeking circulation facts at first hand from the publishers of the motion picture trade papers, have tried to get substitute information by circulation tests. These tests usually have consisted of going to the exhibitors of the country with postal cards, asking those exhibitors what trade paper they read. The percentage of returns has been very small. The tests have been failures. They have not shown the true state of affairs at any time, owing chiefly to the fact that exhibitors, as a rule, have refused to answer the questions asked on the postal tests, sometimes because they are too busy but in the majority of cases because the postal never reached responsible hands.

MOTOGRAPHY has submitted to these postal card tests time after time, not because it had any real faith in the results but because the men in the business requested the tests. These tests can only be successful with the entire co-operation of the exhibitor. Exhibitors should have enough interest in the business to answer test postal cards when they receive them. They should realize that the postal cards are sent out as one of the economies of the business, to eliminate waste in advertising expenditures and to assure advertising in the most widely read trade papers.

MOTOGRAPHY takes this occasion to request its subscribers to answer these postal card tests and to answer them honestly. If a subscriber to MOTOGRAPHY also subscribes to another motion picture trade journal, it is our request that you also mention the other trade journal—and it is also our request that you do not forget to mention MOTOGRAPHY.

Eighty-three Per Cent Against Censorship

IF the consensus of opinion in Illinois is any criterion for the country at large, the people's representatives for the next term will be opposed to the principles of censorship. That is the unmistakable conclusion to be drawn from the poll of candidates taken by MOTOGRAPHY during the past month, whose results are printed in this and the two preceding issues.

Of all the replies received to MOTOGRAPHY'S questions, more than eighty-three per cent take a positive stand against either state or federal censorship. And of the other seventeen per cent, not one comes out for censorship; most of them either plead ignorance of the subject or prefer to consider it after their election—if that event transpires.

The candidates have evidently taken the situation seriously. Since our test questions went out, MOTOGRAPHY'S office and the Chicago office of the Motion Picture Exhibitor's League of America have been visited by a number of interested nominees for political office, who were eager to voice their convictions against censorship. The Republican candidate for secretary of state, Louis L. Emmerson, whose letter appears in this issue, came to Chicago expressly to assure us of his anti-censorship attitude, as did a number of candidates for state representative.

By this time next week the election will be over, and any further communications that come in will be valuable only if their authors have been elected.

In the meantime we bespeak the consideration of motion picture men at the polls next Tuesday for those candidates who have pledged themselves to justice for the films. And this holds good, of course, not only for the state upon which MOTOGRAPHY made its test, but for all states and for the United States.

The Favor of the Church

A PITTSBURGH newspaper in search of local opinion recently took occasion to interview the ministers of the Gospel in that city on the subject of motion pictures. The expressions gathered by the interviewer show that a marked change has taken place in the general attitude of the clergy toward the films.

Time was, not so very long ago, either, when the clergyman who advocated pictures for church use was almost regarded as a heretic, and even casual approval of picture theaters was looked upon as distinctly unorthodox.

The Pittsburgh canvass reveals the fact that the Gospel teachers of today extend their grave approval not only to the motion picture as a principle, but to its industry as it is conducted.

Many of us who wear out our lives in a commercialized and practical world are inclined to underestimate the human importance of the church. We give it respect and reverence, but we ignore its worldly influence. That influence is real and powerful, and will be so as long as hope and fear sway the human mind—the mind of the people upon whom depends the very existence of the picture as an entertainment.

The favor of the church is always worth while, as a straight business proposition. The exhibitor whose program merits the continued approval of the people who habitually attend sacred services, and of their pastor, has founded his business upon a safe basis, from which it will be hard to dislodge him.

Richard Bennett in his newest American Mutual, "And the Law Says," a drama dealing with capital punishment

Bennett Censures Capital Punishment

MUTUAL TO RELEASE WEEKLY ONE-REEL SCENIC "MUTUAL TOURS AROUND WORLD

WITH everyone discussing the powerful production of the legitimate stage of Galsworthy's "Justice," which was a preachment against the conditions existing in English prisons, the Mutual Film Corporation announces that Richard Bennett will appear in a photoplay entitled "And the Law Says," which is one of the most unflinching dramas ever hurled against the proponents of capital punishment. In this play, which will be released during the week of November 6, Mr. Bennett enacts the role of a judge of the old school, law-bound, unyielding, cruel in his adherence to the letter of the law.

The story and scenario were written by Richard Bennett and Anthony W. Coldewey last summer, after Mr. Bennett had spent several days at Sing Sing prison in New York in conference with Thomas Mott Osbourn, that widely known advocate of prison reform, and in search of local color and fact to incorporate in his plot.

Mr. Bennett is supported by Adrienne Morrison, William Carroll, George Periolat, Ashton Dearholt and Charles Newton.

"And the Law Says" will mark Richard Bennett's second appearance in Mutual Star Productions, his third under the Mutual banner, since his first screen success "Damaged Goods," went to the public as a Mutual special feature.

The other leading feature on this program is "East is East." in which Florence Turner is starred.

Coming from an author of the stern unflinching fibre, the training in dramatic and color values which has come from a life lived all over the globe, and yet the delicacy of feeling of Captain Philip Hubbard, the English soldier-gentleman, the story of "East Is East," the fifth of the Mutual Star Productions featuring Florence Turner, could not fail of dramatic "punch" of colorful settings and of heart-touching moments.

"East Is East" is one of the strongest vehicles ever chosen to convey the charms of Florence Turner to her screen audiences, and on this drama of racial differences, Larry Trimble, the producer, has left the stamp of typical Trimble handling. The world has been his home, as well, and the atmosphere he obtains for his pictures is the true atmosphere which comes from personal knowledge of that which he is trying to convey through his medium, the screen.

Miss Turner's role is of the sympathetic, wistful type which is best suited to her abilities. She will delight her audiences as never before.

On Tuesday, November 7, a one-reel scenic of Gaumont production containing picturizations of little excursions into all parts of the world will make its first appearance under the title of "Mutual Tours Around the World." The one-reel release will continue making its appearance weekly on the same day of the week after that.

With the initial issue of this scenic, the weekly output of Gaumont studios through Mutual exchanges will consist of four single-reel scenic, cartoon comic and current topic releases.

The new pictures will be primarily scenic in their nature, but there will also be characteristic views of foreign industries, methods and customs.

The remaining Gaumont material will appear on regular release dates the week of November 6—Mutual Weekly, the current news one-reeler, and "See America First" and Harry Palmer's "Kartoon Komic," the split-reel release, appearing on Wednesday, November 8, and "Reel Life," the Mutual's magazine in film, coming on Sunday, November 12.

On Thursday, November 9, two dramas of short-reel length and of exceptional dramatic and pictorial value will go out to exhibitors through Mutual exchanges.

Florence Turner in "East Is East," her newest Mutual feature.

One, "The Fight on the Dam," will feature J. Warren Kerrigan, the photoplay favorite. It is a very tense drama of short-reel length, bristling to the brim with action and unexpected situations. The other is a two-part drama of mystery, "The False Clue," which is most satisfactory from all viewpoints.

On Saturday, November 11, "The Unpardonable Sin," with Edna Paine and Norbert Myles in the leading roles, will go out as a Mutual release. Edna Paine's dark beauty lends itself wonderfully to the ingenue role that she assumes in this picture, and the virility which characterizes Mr. Myles's screen work adds real force to this picture.

Comedy lovers will find a barrel of laughs in the funny two-reel Vogue comedy release of Sunday, November 12, a picture of the usual Vogue class. The title of this picture is "Picture Pirates." It tells the tale of the adventures of a gang of crooks who carry on a high-handed game of stealing famous pictures.

Ben Turpin and Rube Miller are screamingly funny in their make-ups as picture connoisseurs, stove pipe hats, white spats, frock coats and all. Lillian Hamilton makes an attractive maid.

Another comedy will be released during the week, "His Blushing Bride," a Cub one-reeler, will go to the public on Friday, November 10.

M. P. E. L. PRESIDENT SUES

Article in Variety Concerning Lee A. Ochs and Motion Picture Exhibitors' League Causes $100,000 Damage Suit.

Following the recent attack on Lee A. Ochs, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, which appeared in Variety, a New York publication, action against those responsible was not long delayed. Upon Mr. Ochs' complaint, legal action was at once instituted in a suit for $100,000 against Variety, as a corporation, Sims Silverman, as publisher, and Joseph Lowe, as editor.

Papers were also served in a similar action on Messrs. Fleischman & Goldreyer, the exhibitors whose names were appended to the published letter upon which the Variety article was based. Exhibitors and representative motion picture men everywhere expressed indignation over the article. According to Thomas Howard, state secretary of the League, the exhibitors regard it more as an attack upon the League than as a personal attack upon Mr. Ochs.

At the offices of the League, No. 210 E. 42d street, New York, many exhibitors called to assure Mr. Ochs that they were solidly behind him in such action as he chose to take in the matter. Samuel H. Trigger, one of the most prominent exhibitors in New York City, was a leader in the impromptu indignation meeting at League headquarters.

"The attack on Mr. Ochs," he said, "is entirely unwarranted, and while the animus that lies behind it is not entirely clear, we all feel that it is directly due to his activities in behalf of the League as its president."

At the offices of the V. L. S. E., Paramount, Metro, World Film, and Pathe, all of which companies were mentioned in the article attacking Mr. Ochs, similar sentiments were expressed. At each of these the executives in charge said that the motives impugned to Mr. Ochs were not only without foundation, but were maliciously false.

At the offices of Goldsmith, Rosenthal, Mork & Baum, attorneys for Mr. Ochs, it was learned that further action might be taken against the defendants named in the suit, and that the matter probably would reach the district attorney's office.

"This is really an attack upon the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America," said Mr. Goldsmith, "and not on Mr. Ochs personally. Mr. Ochs has been active in matters which were of benefit to the League and its members, and necessarily may have incurred some criticism on this score. But the League stands solidly behind him, the more so because this attack has been incurred purely by reason of his work in its behalf.

"As a matter of fact, the exhibitors who have chosen to sign their names to a letter which neither of them could ever have written, have only been members of the League for the past three weeks. The membership committee was unwilling to pass favorably on their applications at first, and it was Mr. Ochs himself who personally insisted on their being admitted as members of the League, on the ground that he wished every exhibitor in the country to be identified with the organization."

The article on which Mr. Ochs brings the suit stated that he had used his position as president of the League for his personal gain, a statement not borne out even by the objectionable letter upon which the article was based.

Mr. Ochs, except to say that he regarded the article being aimed more at the League than himself, would make no statement, but referred all inquiries to his counsel.

MOTOGRAPHY:

Kindly tell me where I can secure moving picture films pertaining to domestic science; also subjects to select from and the charges for same per day when shown for benefit of domestic science club.

Mrs. E. L. Calvert, Manager, Electric Theater

Christie Comedies Through Independents

C. H. Christie, the business end of the Christie Film Company of Los Angeles, has been making a tour of the East for the purpose of making contracts with independent exchanges to handle the Christie comedies, which have made such an impression because they are not only entertaining and laughable but clean cut. During his visit to Chicago Mr. Christie called on MOTOGRAPHY. He is enthusiastic over the future of the Christie comedies.

At the present time, according to Mr. Christie, his company is releasing a one-reel comedy a week but they are planning to increase the size of their comedies to two reels and have 52 releases of the two-reel size each week. During his visit East Mr. Christie has had interviews with several managers of the program companies, two of which desired to place the Christie comedies on their programs. The inducements offered, according to Mr. Christie, were such that he feels he must release through independent exchanges.

After a summer engagement at Coney Island, Captain Jack Bonavita and the Bostock wild animals are back at the Horsley studios in Los Angeles, preparing for the production of a new series of large feature pictures in which the animals will be used.

First Aid to Theater Men

BY S. L. ROTHAPFEL

THAT it is impossible for the exhibitor to please everyone no matter how hard he tries, and that there will always be some people who are chronic kickers, and who look only for the flaws and never for the good points of the performance is one of the great trials of the motion picture theater manager. But although we are always sorry to displease one of our patrons, still this same criticism from one man may be offset by a number of highly pleased comments from the next one. This point is aptly illustrated by two letters which I received this week, and which were absolutely opposed to each other. The first one read:

84—Having noted your replies to alleged queries by exhibitors in MOTOGRAPHY, I would myself like to ask one question, as follows: What would you think of an exhibitor who shoots film through at the rate of from ninety to one hundred and five feet per minute, thus not only utterly ruining the work of the artists and producer, but making necessary such very heavy tension on the projector tension springs that the film is permanently injured in its sprocket holes, and thus every exhibitor who rents that film, or these films, thereafter must have the result on his screen injured in proportion to the damage done by the "speed idiot", also the work of every operator must suffer without any fault of his own, because strained films cannot be projected in the best possible manner. I ask this of you, because the few times I have patronized the Rialto theater, of which you are manager, I have been utterly disgusted at the ridiculous speed at which the pictures are projected. I have timed reels in that house at as high as 105 feet to the minute, and the common speed is far above seventy. In view of the rotten work in the Rialto your reply to this should be interesting. I have watched President Wilson transformed into a jumping jack on your screen—made utterly ridiculous, and it was something more than a shame. In my opinion the responsible party should have been horsewhipped. I will await your reply through MOTOGRAPHY with interest.

When I agreed to answer questions in MOTOGRAPHY in my department, "First Aid to Theater Men," my idea was to help exhibitors, if I could, not to enter into any controversy whatsoever, but this letter I will answer, inasmuch as the writer brings up a topic here that is worthy of comment. I have also had an argument or a minor controversy on this subject with one of the so-called projection experts of a trade paper, and all I can say is this, that as usual things are very much exaggerated. Very often I find it necessary to run pictures at the speed mentioned, but not all pictures are run at this rate. It is entirely a matter of tempo in this theater, and the exhibitor or operator who runs his pictures at so many minutes per reel, or any man who presents pictures and who insists on running his pictures at so many minutes per reel, has not progressed and has not seen the remarkable possibilities of accelerating or decreasing the tempo, as the case may be. I do deny, however, that any of the characters on my screen, say President Wilson, for instance, who is mentioned in the letter, looks like a jumping jack. True, we may at times speed up a Keystone comedy which materially improves it, or a feature may be run at a speed of 90 without injuring it any, or I might further say that some scenes are taken too fast to get the proper effect, or too slow as the case may be, yet this is a complaint coming from one of the men, perhaps, who would like to have seen the Rialto a failure. Fortunately for me it is not a failure, but instead, perhaps, the most remarkable success in the moving picture industry, and is growing steadily.

As to the condition of the film, if a film is strained or is not in a condition to be shown again after a week's run here, it should be replaced with new film, yet I have had no complaints from this source, and our machines are kept so perfectly adjusted that since the opening week we have had no breaks or any sign of a stop in our performance, which tells the story in itself.

I ask you, the readers of this paper, how long do you suppose I will be able to get twenty-five and fifty cents at night for a picture performance in the city of New York, catering to the most fastidious and critical audience in America, if I were guilty of doing what the writer accuses me of doing?

The other letter, which might be said to serve as an antidote for the vitrol in the first one, reads:

I want to thank for you for a most pleasant afternoon's entertainment. You deserve a lot of credit for giving Greater New York, and other places, such a show, and at such reasonable prices. Your house should be crowded at every performance, and I hope it is. I have been to The Rialto quite a few times, but doubt that I ever enjoyed my visit more than this P. M. Everything about the place seems to me to be fine—there is an air of refinement all around, nice attention, etc., etc., and what can I say about the music—it's simply grand. As a gentleman remarked to me while standing at back of orchestra listening to the overture, "Der Meistersinger," for the second time: "That performance is worth more than twice the price of admission," and I fully agreed with him. My programme is marked with about what I thought of the entertainment. I have seen some good pictures at other houses, but as stated above there is something about The Rialto that is different. The Strand is very fine, of course, but I don't see any of them like The Rialto. I wish you all possible success. Am not in the habit of writing letters of this kind; in fact, never did before in my life, and probably will not again, but, as the "boys" say, "it's on my chest" and I must get rid of it, so there you are.

On the marked program which accompanied this letter, some comment was made on every part of the program. After the name of Hugo Riesenfeld, conductor of the orchestra, was written, "an artist." The overture was marked "splendid," and beside the names of the members of the orchestra was written "splendid music. Fine orchestra. A real treat to hear them play." The rest of the program bore the following comments: S. Fidelman, "Caprice Viennoise," Kreisler—"very fine." Rialto Travelogue, "splendid." The Experiences of Donald C. Thompson, "very interesting." Interpretative dance, "very, very nice. Splendid music." Norma Talmadge in "Fifty-Fifty," "fine picture. Very interesting. Well done and worth seeing over again." Hilda Goodwin in song, "Ah, Fors'e lui" from Traviata, "grand voice; splendid." Keystone comedy, "very, very funny and well worth seeing."

You will note the quotation in this letter, "I have seen good pictures in other houses, but, as stated above, there is something about the Rialto that is different." This is my answer. I do not do things the way some of the other fellows do them—I try to be different. I saw possibilities in correcting tempos and they have been highly successful. I have had numerous people ask me, "Why do the pictures look so much finer in your theater than in any other theater where I have been bored to death in looking at some of the pictures?" My friends, it is merely a matter of tempo. I use my head and I don't run every picture at 15 or 16 minutes to the reel, as they used to do years ago and as some of them are doing at this minute. To me a reel means only an implement upon which to wind film. That is the only time I ever use it. Our film is very carefully cut, measured, timed and synchronized with music; if I may be pardoned for saying so and not to be thought egotistical, in a manner which has never been equaled in the moving picture industry. The ensemble result is what I am after. My box office tells me that I am right, and I am sorry, indeed, that Mr. Hemingsway did not give me his address so that I could take him over here and show him personally just what I mean. If he will come to the theater and make himself known I shall be indeed glad to let him see for himself that perhaps I am not to be so severely criticized as he saw fit to do in his communication. Mr. Hemingsway will also please note that more than 85 per cent of the entire trade-directors and men interested in the technical detail of the pictures come here to see presentations and I have never heard a complaint along this line.

Exhibitors, suppose you take a film, an ordinary drama, and, after your show it closed, run it at different speed. Try this once and let me know what the result will be. I am sure that you will all be amazed. For instance, you have seen men walk—some fellows walk with a slow, even gait, the other fellow walks along in a sort of happy-go-lucky fashion which doesn't mean anything. Which would you choose? The same thing is true of the projection. Pictures that would ordinarily look dead and lack life look entirely different after the revolution is increased eight or ten and some times more.

Understand me, I am not defending the speed idiot, nor would I tolerate this for one moment. How silly to be accused of doing these things when here over a million and a half are at stake. If I were guilty of a charge of this kind I would not have enough people in my house to pay my light bill, not alone being able to carry an orchestra of forty artists and overhead expenses which were thought impossible only three years ago, yet I am able to show a profit in this theater which exceeds any other theater showing motion pictures. Think it over!

Attractive Advertising Booklet

The new Signal Film Corporation offering, "A Lass of the Lumberlands," starring Helen Holmes, heroine of "The Girl and the Game" and a number of Mutual Star productions, was announced to the trade through attractive eight-page booklets, 8x8 in size, which were enclosed in sepia envelopes bearing on the surface a reproduction of the bark of a tree across which was lettered in white: "Announcing a New, Big Chapter-Play," and in the lower left hand corner appeared a portrait of the star. The cover of the booklet is a two-color reproduction of a huge log, on one end of which appeared the announcement of the picture and the title. The inside back cover contains a full list of all 68 of the Mutual film exchanges. Each of the eight pages of the booklet was illustrated and printed in two colors. The booklets and enclosing envelopes were designed and written by the Burnet-Kuhn Advertising Company, of Chicago, the same firm which handled the advertising and publicity campaign on several other motion picture serials.

Someone Thinks of the Cameraman

Someone has thought of the cameraman. He has not only been thought of but has been written about—in two hundred and eighty pages of mighty interesting reading. The book, just published by the Century Company of New York, and written by Francis A. Collins, is a very complete and fascinating picture of the cameraman in all his various activities. "His Adventures in Many Fields" is the sub-title, and this is lived up to in the various incidents narrated in the book. Among the subjects treated are "War Stuff," "Aero-Photography," "The News Photographer," "Commercial Photography," "On Location" and "Scientific Research," "The First Cameraman, and the Future of the Profession," is followed by the department containing practical subjects for the amateur.

Whether actively interested in the motion picture industry or not, one will find the "Cameraman" a well written treatment of an interesting subject.

Takes Farrar Play to New York

Cecil B. De Mille, Lasky Company director-general, has started for New York with the first print of the Geraldine Farrar production, the story of which is based on the life of Joan of Arc. Mr. De Mille will be accompanied by the author, Jeanie MacPherson, and her mother, Alvin Wyckoff, director of photography, and Howard Ewing, director of lighting. These three people toiled with the Lasky chief on an average of eighteen hours a day during the entire time required in the making of the gigantic production, and Mr. De Mille is taking them east with him for a brief vacation, while he is superintending the presentation of the picture in New York.

Urges Directors to Organize

Murdock MacQuarrie is in New York agitating the organization of the directors in the east along the same lines as those followed by the Motion Picture Directors' Association of the West Coast, and offering his assistance in the formation of such an association.

A number of the producers do not seem to be in favor of this organization fearing that such an association might lead to demands for more salary, walk-outs and other unpleasantnesses. Mr. MacQuarrie explains, however, that the proposed association is not to be a union, its aim being merely that of benevolence and mutual interest.

Triangle Film Aids Hospital Corps

An active committee to exploit the Triangle film, "Our American Boys in the European War," was formed this week while Captain A. Piatt Andrew, head of the American ambulance field service, was in the city. Since the organization of the committee more than fifty bookings have been arranged for the next few weeks. All of these showings are made under social auspices and the entire proceeds forwarded to the American Field Service in France.

Work of remodeling and rebuilding the Lasky studio will commence shortly. The first thing to go up will be a 75x200 ft. glass stage, and the much needed administration building will be under way about the same time. Additions will also be made to the laboratory.

Fox Makes Powerful Prison Film

GOVERNOR HUNT OF ARIZONA CO-OPERATES IN MAKING UNUSUAL FEATURE

Prison scene from Fox's big new feature, "The Honor System."

WARDEN OSBORNE'S resignation from Sing Sing prison has made prison reform the topic of the hour. His taking the stump against Governor Whitman and criticising the superintendent of prisons has aroused widespread interest throughout the country in the fate of the man behind the bars.

Just at this psychological moment William Fox is about to release his gigantic prison problem film, "The Honor System."

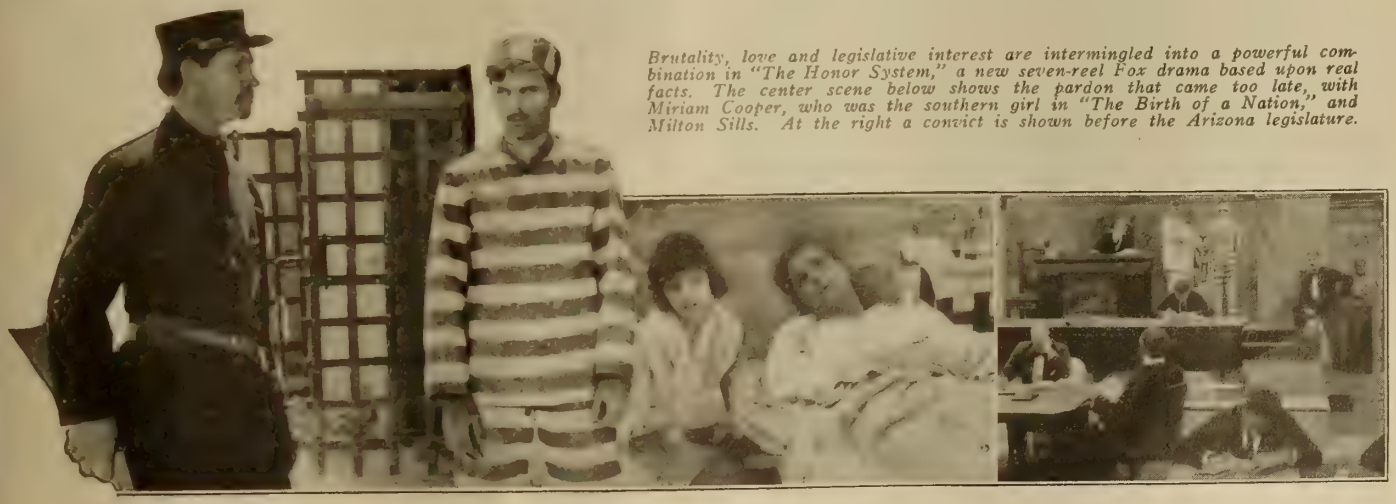
The Fox Film Corporation has been working on this production for more than a year. It is on a par with the Kellermann "picture beautiful," only in a class of its own.

Though prison reform is the dominant note in the production, gripping human interest is not lacking. The love motif is strong and true. The humor is genuine. The play makes you weep, but brings the sunshine of laughter to dry your tears.

"The Honor System" has been directed by R. A. Walsh, supported by a cast of artistes and types famous in the motion picture world. There are even animal actors that perform their parts with wondrous naturalness.

"The Honor System" was produced mainly in prison scenes. Real convicts enacted some of the parts.

"The Honor System" was produced mainly in Arizona and along the Mexican border. In order to give this film every attribute of real life, Mexican raids were staged which were absolutely correct in every detail. Thousands of men are shown taking place in cavalry charges and in battles, in every respect similar to those being fought between the warring factions of Mexico today.



R. A. Walsh, before screening the first scene of his battle pictures, spent weeks in going over the ground and working out his strategic maneuvers under the guidance of military experts. Film artists and connoisseurs who have witnessed these scenes pronounce them perfect.

To depict the prison scenes showing old, brutal methods, Governor Hunt placed at the disposal of the Fox Film Corporation the old prison at Yuma, Arizona, which in its time has been one of the most terrible hell-holes in existence.

Convicts from the modern prison at Florence, Arizona, assisted in many of the scenes.

Great preparations are being made by the Fox Film Corporation to see that "The Honor System" comes into its own in the matter of recognition when it is placed before the public.

George P. Hunt, governor of Arizona, sent the Brutality, love and legislative interest are intermingled into a powerful combination in "The Honor System," a new seven-reel Fox drama based upon real facts. The center scene below shows the pardon that came too late, with Miriam Cooper, who was the southern girl in "The Birth of a Nation," and Milton Sills. following message to Mr. Fox concerning this photo-tragedy.

"Everyone in the United States should see your production, 'The Honor System,' and take to heart its lesson of prison reform.

"It contrasts the old prison system with its inhuman terrorism—its beatings, starvings, murders, suicides—with the modern method which recognizes that every convict has a human soul worthy of redemption.

"I congratulate you upon filming 'The Honor System.' It will do untold good to suffering men throughout this country. It will awaken our public to a sense of responsibility toward men behind the bars.

"'The Honor System' brings home to everyone the question: 'Am I my brother's keeper?'"

The film was recently shown at Sing Sing, in the presence of the then Warden Thomas Mott Osborne and 1,800 members of his Mutual Welfare League.

In speaking of this film after the exhibition, one of the members of the Mutual Welfare League commended the film enthusiastically. Among other things he said:

"In producing 'The Honor System' Mr. Fox has struck at the very heart of prison despotism. He has thrown the searchlight of publicity full upon the horrors which made the prisons of the old type a living hell and has truthfully shown the modern prison of today with its Mutual Welfare League and its honor system. It is an argument for the honor system which no one can refute, and should accomplish more for prison reform than any argument heretofore advanced."

The writer of this scenario, Henry Christeen Warnack, has been interested in prison reform for many years. He is principal feature and editorial writer on the Los Angeles Times. All the educational value of his experience, combined with his expert knowledge as a writer, has been put into "The Honor System" by the author.

The love story alone in "The Honor System" will be sufficient to make it a truly great production. Combined with this love story, however, we have the splendid background and human story of prison reform.

"THE CRISIS" TYPICAL

Every Effort Has Been Made to Show Historical Facts and Typical Scenes of This Epoch of America's Struggle

American history—that portion of it relating to the antebellum days, just prior to and during the Civil War—has been preserved for posterity through the medium of the motion picture camera in the filming of Winston Churchill's great novel, "The Crisis," which has just been produced by Wm. N. Selig and which is shortly to have its metropolitan debut.

No picture heretofore produced has attempted to so clearly depict the intense feeling which ran riot through the South just preceding the Civil War as does "The Crisis." It presents in graphic form all of the incidents and events which brought on the great conflict, and, at the same time, has interwoven through it the charming and wholesome story of Colonel Carvel and his inseparable friend, Judge Silas Whipple, who although of widely divergent principles on the question of slavery, were as Damon and Pythias in their companionship.

In filming "The Crisis," use was made of the old Carvel homestead near St. Louis, and many historical documents, jewels, works of art and locations were utilized to make the picturization as nearly historically perfect as was possible. Characters chosen for their strong resemblance to the types typical of the South in those days were used throughout the entire picture. Even the historic Mississippi river, with its side and stern wheel steamers of the vintage of 1860, figures to some extent in the faithful portrayal. Perhaps one of the most effective features of "The Crisis" is the introduction to the screen in actual historical scenes of Abraham Lincoln. His lovable character and his very mannerisms have been portrayed, and he is almost made to live again in the flesh, so true to life is the characterization of the late Sam D. Crane in this most remarkable of roles.

Unlike most "big" pictures of the age, "The Crisis" does not depend upon its battle scenes for its impressiveness. True, many of the noted engagements of the war have been reproduced in realistic manner, but there is in "The Crisis" a well-defined and closely connected theme which in itself would serve its purpose.

Triangle's November Releases

Wilfred Lucas and Charles Ray are the stars of the Triangle feature releases for the week of November 19. Mr. Lucas appears in a Fine Arts comedy drama of novel interest entitled, "The Microscope Mystery," written by W. E. Wing and directed by Paul Powell. Mr. Lucas takes the part of an honest country doctor with a small and dwindling practice but great enthusiasm for the study of germ life. He is supported by Constance Talmadge.

Charles Ray has a vehicle of strong interest in the Ince production of "The Honorable Algy," in which he takes the part of the youngest son of a titled English family who is sent to America to contract a good marriage and save the family fortunes. Margery Wilson and Margaret Thompson are headlined with him.

A dive of 100 feet at Hollenbeck Park, Los Angeles, has put Jean Perkins, a member of the Helen Holmes Signal-Mutual Company filming "A Lass of the Lumberlands," in the hospital. At the moment of striking the water Perkins twisted his body and an abdominal muscle was torn loose. He will be confined to hospital several weeks. An operation was performed.

Selznick Leases Biograph Studio

CHARLES GIBLYN ENGAGED AS DIRECTOR OF SELZNICK-PICTURES

LEWIS SELZNICK'S plan to present noted stars in big feature productions on the open booking market has met with such tremendous success that already he has been forced to look for larger quarters to accommodate the ever increasing number of producing companies whose output is being marketed under the trade name, Selznick-Pictures. Mr. Selznick closed negotiations last week for the lease of the Biograph studio and plant on East 175th street, one of the largest and most perfectly equipped studios in the east. Within the next three weeks four Selznick-Pictures companies will be producing under the Biograph roof, while other companies continue their operations at the two studios already in use on the Palisades of the Hudson.

The Biograph plant is admirably adapted to Mr. Selznick's needs, as it offers ample room for at least six companies working simultaneously in the production of feature photoplays. The main studio building gives floor space, 80x120 feet, and is really two studios of that size in one. The ground floor is occupied by the various workshops. The second floor is the artificial light studio, in which are installed walls of one thousand Cooper-Hewitt lights. The third floor holds the commodious dressing rooms with their shower baths and their up-to-date conveniences, while the fourth floor serves as the daylight studio, being entirely glassed in.

The plant has its own developing and printing facilities, its own electric lighting system and is equipped to the last notch of perfection, even to the extent of having its own restaurant conducted by a caterer who formerly managed one of the big resorts at Coney Island.

Miss Young Works on Two Productions

By taking over the Biograph studio, Mr. Selznick has made possible the realization of one of his original plans, that of making use of Clara Kimball Young's services in two productions simultaneously.

For the past three weeks Director-General Albert Capellani of the Clara Kimball Young Film Corporation has been producing at the Solax studio in Fort Lee, N. J., the successor to "The Common Law." This, the second of the new producing company's features, is an adaptation of Thomas Dixon's noted novel, "The Foolish Virgin."

While Miss Young and her company were on a trip to the Catskills last week taking exterior scenes, Mr. Capellani's assistants headed by studio manager, Thomas Persons, moved all their paraphernalia from Fort Lee to the Biograph plant and this production will be finished in the new quarters.

At the same time, Charles Giblyn, the well-known Fine Arts director, who has just joined the Selznick forces, will take charge of Miss Young's third production, a version of "The Price She Paid" by the late David Graham Phillips. Work on the two productions will be so synchronized as to make it possible for Miss Young, without overtaxing her energies, to devote herself to each production alternately and thus the output of her pictures will be doubled.

Allan Dwan, the director engaged by Joseph M. Schenck, president of the Norma Talmadge Film Corporation, another Selznick-Pictures producing ally, began work this week at the Biograph on Miss Talmadge's first production under her management. This will be a screen version of Monckton Hoffe's drama, "Panthea," which created a tremendous furore when played in the capitals of Europe and in London, and was produced in America with immense success by Madame Olga Petrova.

Kitty Gordon, who has just finished the first of her own company's productions, an adaptation of the novel, "Vera, the Medium," by the late Richard Harding Davis, will also begin producing her second Selznick-Pictures offering at the Biograph plant, as will the producing companies of two additional stars of the first magnitude, whose names will be announced within a few days.

Herbert Brenon will continue to produce his Selznick-Pictures at the Ideal Studios on Hudson Heights, where he has just completed his first great offering, Nazimova in "War Brides." The Herbert Brenon Film Corporation has a five-year lease on this studio and will occupy it alone, as the plant is perfectly adapted for the productions of any one director.

Charles Giblyn Joins Selznick

Charles Giblyn, one of the best-known of the Triangle directors, has transferred his activities to Selznick-Pictures, and took charge this week of the third feature to be produced by the Clara Kimball Young Film Corporation, an adaptation of David Graham Phillips' novel, "The Price She Paid."

The rights to this novel were originally purchased for Norma Talmadge when she became a Selznick star, but it was finally decided to present Miss Talmadge in "Panthea" and give the Phillips' novel to Miss Young as better suited to the latter's personality and temperament.

"CIVILIZATION" SOLD

Nathan Hirsh Organizes Company and Pays Record Price for Greater New York Rights for Big Ince War Spectacle

"Civilization" is going bit by bit, i.e. the territory is gradually being disposed of. Greater New York has been acquired by Nathan Hirsh of No. 130 West 46th street, New York, who has formed the Civilization Feature Company for the purpose of exploiting the picture in the territory of Greater New York, all of Long Island and the upper section of Westchester county, as far as White Plains.

This is a big and lucrative field—one of the richest in the country for picture exhibition. The price paid for the rights approached "six figures" but the exact amount will not be divulged.

It is the intention of Mr. Hirsh to exploit "Civilization" first in the larger motion picture theaters, in one and two week stands, and then in houses of smaller seating capacity. This will be the first time that a photoplay of the importance and reputation of "Civilization" has been given to exhibitors with 600 seat houses, and by which the exhibitor may obtain the full benefit of the feature on a straight rental.

Ten prints of "Civilization" go with the Greater New York rights; and more will be released if necessary.

Nathan Hirsh, the general manager of the Civilization Feature Company, is well known to exhibitors as president of the Pioneer Feature Film Corporation.

MILLIONAIRE FILM CLUB

An Exclusive Club and Extensive Club House Planned for the New Motion Picture Millionaires' Club in New York

An exclusive club for film people only—and particularly those of this industry who have attained great wealth by their endeavors—is planned for New York. A number of the most prominent men in the motion picture industry, all of whom have made great fortunes within the past few years, have banded together for the purpose of organizing such a club. It is their intention to buy a site, erect a club house, which will include a private motion picture theater for exhibition purposes, and to bring all the big men in the business together in a social way, making the club the real headquarters of the motion picture industry.

Among the millionaire captains of the motion picture business interested in the proposition to start a club are Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players-Lasky Company; Hiram Abrams, president of the Paramount; Jesse Lasky, of the Famous Players-Lasky Company; Aaron Jones, of Jones, Linick & Schaefer, of Chicago; Daniel Frohman, of the Famous Players, and Marcus Loew. It is reported that C. F. Zittel, the dramatic manager of the Evening Journal, is slated to be secretary of the club. Arthur Friend, the attorney for the Famous Players-Lasky Company, is also active in promoting the organization.

All the charter members are to be millionaires, but whether the possession of a million dollars will be a requirement insisted on from all other members is not yet certain. The difficulties that the picture magnates now have running around to see new releases would all be obviated if important films were first exhibited in their club house, where every convenience would be furnished and the picture magnates could take their leisure in looking at films.

Harry Watson, alias "Musty Suffer," has completed exteriors for his first Essanay production and has begun work in the studios. Louis Mylls is directing him at Essanay.

ANNUAL EXHIBITORS' BALL

All But Six Boxes Already Taken for Ball on Thanksgiving Night Which Will Outshine Last Year's Success

The film ball which was held in New York last year drew out from twenty to thirty thousand people but the Thanksgiving night ball to be held in Madison Square Garden under the auspices of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America bids fair to outshine the phenomenal success of a year ago.

All of the boxes with the exception of six have been sold, and over seventy applications have been received for those that remain. Among the concerns which have bought boxes and the number taken are the following: Metro, 26; Universal, 9; Pathe, 8; Vitagraph, 5; International, 5. From one to three boxes have also been taken by the following: Essanay, Brenon, Feature Film Company, Sherman Elliott, V. L. S. E., Powers, Simplex, Unicorn and Kalem.

The contract for decorating involving an expenditure of over $6,000, has been awarded to W. H. Masten Company of this city. During the evening six of the leading New York firms will conduct fashion reviews of imported gowns which will be shown on living models. One of the novelties this year will be a cabaret, which will be held in the basement from the time the ball opens until it closes. Three prizes of $100, $50 and $25, respectively, have been offered to the three manufacturers who provide the most novel stunt for the evening's entertainment.

Fahrney Turns Out His 64th Cub

Director Milton H. Fahrney is at work on the second of a new series of Cub comedies, twelve in number, which are to feature George Ovey, who created the character of Jerry a year and a half ago. Since that time, Director Fahrney has made Cub comedies at the rate of about one each week.

New Comedy Series for Vitagraph

FRANK DANIELS TO BE STARRED IN "THE CAPTAIN JINKS SERIES"

Little Mary Anderson.

THE Greater Vitagraph Company announces a third series of comedies in which Frank Daniels will be starred. These will be known as "The Captain Jink's Series," and will be released through its own exchanges. Van Dyke Brooke is directing Mr. Daniels. The titles and release dates for the first ten productions (in which Mr. Daniels introduces a new style of comedy acting) are as follows: November 27, "Captain Jinks Should Worry;" December 4, "Captain Jinks' Evolution;" December 11, "Captain Jinks' Hidden Treasure;" December 18, "Captain Jinks' Sprained Angle;" December 25, "Captain Jinks' Get-away;" January 1, "Captain Jinks' Love Insurance;" January 8, "Captain Jinks and Himself;" January 15, "Captain Jinks' Stingy Spirit;" January 22, "Captain Jinks' Trial Balance," and January 29, "Captain Jinks' Better Half."

The addition of these comedies to Greater Vitagraph's program brings the total releases of that organization up to nine reels per week comprised of a five-part Blue Ribbon Feature; a two-part serial with each episode complete in itself; a "Big V Comedy" of the slapstick variety; and the new-style Frank Daniels' "Captain Jinks Comedy."

New Plays for Earle Williams

Colonel Jasper Ewing Brady, scenario editor of the Greater Vitagraph Company, has recently acquired some high-quality stories for film subjects. One important purchase is the film rights to "Arsene Lupin," as dramatized by Paul Potter. The lead chosen for this production is Earle Williams. Other recent purchases in which Mr. Williams will appear are "The Hawk," the stage success written by Francis de Croisset; "Apartment 29," an original scenario by Edward J. Montagne of the Vitagraph staff; and two plays by Rufus Steele "The Simpson Sapphire" and "The Pretender."

"Salvation Joan" No Longer Special

The Vitagraph-V. L. S. E. exchange managers have been notified that "Salvation Jane," which has heretofore been handled as a "special," has been removed from that classification and may now be booked as a super or Blue Ribbon Feature. With this restriction removed it is now possible for exhibitors to readily book this production, or, if they are taking regularly a certain number of Vitagraph pictures, the exchange managers will gladly include it in their service as they would any other Blue Ribbon Feature.

Marguerite Bertsch Scores Success

Marguerite Bertsch both writes and directs Blue Ribbon Features for the Vitagraph Company. Her most recent success is "The Devil's Prize," the five-part feature in which Antonio Moreno and Naomi Childers are starred, and which will be released on November 6. Miss Bertsch, who formerly presided over the manuscript department of the Vitagraph, is one of the few women in the field but she has already won her spurs as a director.

Detroit Exhibitor Books Features

John H. Kunsky, who operates eight theaters in Detroit, Michigan, accompanied by some of the other officials of his company, recently visited New York for the purpose of examining before their release a number of Greater Vitagraph productions. Two photoplays were booked for the Washington Theater at once. "The Chattel," featuring E. H. Sothern and Peggy Hyland was shown for a week commencing October 22; and "The Combat," was shown for the week of October 29.

After proceeding to list all of the important Greater Vitagraph productions scheduled for release before the New Year and commenting upon the acknowledged celebrities that are due to appear in these productions, the editor of Mr. Kunsky's house-organ goes on to say that all of the really important photoplay attractions of the year will be Vitagraph productions, shown first in Detroit in the Kunsky theaters.

Mr. Kunsky has expressed himself enthusiastically about the Vitagraph-V. L. S. E. booking policy, which can be summed up in the sentence—"Pictures sold to you the way you want to buy them."

Sales Meeting in Philadelphia

Monday evening, October 16, Leon J. Bamberger held a Vitagraph-V. L. S. E. sales meeting in Philadelphia, at which the leading subject discussed was the new idea of selling a district instead of making the price dependent upon the house. The idea was accepted most enthusiastically, and the men started out the next morning determined to use it for all it was worth in every town.

Powerful scene from "The Last Man," the James Oliver Curwood story transformed into a Vitagraph Blue Ribbon feature with Mary Anderson and William Duncan.

"CHARITY?" FOR DECEMBER

Mutual Film Corporation Announces Completion of Special Release, the Work of Lina Griffith and Frank Powell

The Mutual Film Corporation will release its seven part special feature "Charity?" the work of Linda A. Griffith—Mrs. David Wark Griffith—and Frank

"Charity?" the Frank Powell production featuring Creighton Hale, Linda Griffith and Sheldon Lewis and to be distributed by Mutual.

Powell, about the first of December. This feature will be put out as a special release and will be given an unusual promotion calculated to awaken the public to the extraordinary nature of the production.

The picture is a rather startling drama written about a bit of romance and an all too common life problem of poverty and institutional life for the unprotected child.

"Charity?" is an expose. It is aimed at no particular institution, no particular locality, no creed, no organization. It takes its text simply against charitable abuses which the public prints prove to be frequent and many. "Charity?" makes its appeal in behalf of common justice and fairness. Where it exposes graft and inhumanity it is exposing a phase of the charity problem which is not unknown in every large American community.

Mrs. Griffith appears in the production with Creighton Hale and Shelden Lewis occupying roles of dominant importance.

Some personages of national importance have been taken into counsel in connection with the making of this production and following its release they will be heard from in terms that will lend force to the picture and its cause. The keynote of the play, "Charity?" is misuse of charity funds.

Mrs. Griffith began her screen career in 1908 when she appeared in "An Adventurous Dolly," the first picture produced by David Wark Griffith, whom she later married. Through her work in this picture, Mrs. Griffith became known as "The Biograph Girl," Later Mrs. Griffith was featured in "The Scarlet Letter," "Everyman," "As the Candle Burns," "The Wife," "A Fair Rebel," and many other plays. She was especially successful in "Beverly of Graustark."

Microbe Actors in Feature

The latest addition to the acting forces of the Triangle-Fine Arts company are a troupe of remarkable "microbe actors" that play a prominent part in the solution of "The Microscope Mystery," a unique comedy-drama by W. E. Wing that has recently been completed with Wilfred Lucas and Constance Talmadge in the leading role.

The use of bacilli and infinitesimal insect life in motion pictures has been brought about by the invention of Louis H. Tolhurst of Los Angeles, who has perfected apparatus which makes it possible to photograph the tiniest particles of sentient protoplasm. Application has been made by Mr. Tolhurst for patents on his invention. Meanwhile the original model, used in the filming of "The Microscope Mystery," is being carefully guarded to prevent its secret from being learned.

The possibilities opened up by the Tolhurst invention for the utilization in the films of objects ordinarily invisible to the naked eye have led to the formation of a partnership between the young inventor and W. E. Wing, the veteran scenario writer. The agreement calls for the furnishing by Mr. Wing of photoplays which will introduce bacilli thespians in the same unusual way that they have been used to heighten the dramatic effects of "The Microscope Mystery."

In this feature they have not been dragged into the action "by their heels." Mr. Wing has written a vehicle for the microbes which bring them into the story in a perfectly logical manner. In fact, the solution of the mystery is solved by the leading character—and the audience—through observing the antics of the tiny disease germs under the microscope.

Featuring Dorothy Phillips, Lon Chaney and Maude George, Director Joseph De Grasse is filming at Universal City "The Piper's Price," in five reels.

This convincing hospital scene is from the coming seven-reel Essanay story, "The Truant Soul," which is just being completed in Chicago. The little nurse is Mary Charleson and Dr. Henry Walthall stands on the operating stool at her side. Real surgeons arranged the detail of this scene and honest-to-God students were brought down from Northwestern University to make the clinic real.

The Photoplay Scenario

CONDUCTED BY B. F. BARRETT

Former Editor of Photoplay Scenario Magazine.

Note—This department will appear hereafter in each issue of Motography, and will treat of all subjects of interest to the photoplaywright—whether amateur or professional. You are invited to suggest any subjects you desire to have discussed, or ask questions on any matters relating to the writing of photoplays which have been puzzling you. The department is also open to you at any time for the expression of your own ideas or the submitting of ideas of others which have helped you, and will be interesting to other photoplay writers.

An Interview with Prof. Freeburg

VICTOR O. FREEBURG, professor of The Photoplay in Columbia University, the youthful, good-natured genius who was given the first practical, constructive collegiate course in photoplay writing to be established in this country, sat hunched up in a big Morris chair with his chin cupped in his left hand and pulled vigorously at a long stemmed pipe. He was glad to give a little outline of the work he is doing at the university and his opinions on the different phases of the pictures as shown on the screen to satisfy the many inquirers who have wanted to know what a regular university course in photoplay writing was like.

Dr. Freeburg is a deep student of painting and sculpture, as well as the photoplay. He is exceedingly well versed in Shakespeare, and while a professor of English in Columbia he wrote a monograph on disguised plots in Elizabethan plays.

Anyone could tell at once that this tall, bronzed and unacademic university teacher is a westerner. His face and his entire demeanor bespeak the west. More precisely Kansas is the exact state of his nativity.

Like young Lochinvar, the young Freeburg came out of the west after acquiring his early education beyond the Rockies. He came to Yale and was the author of several plays produced there. He sojourned at the College of the City of New York long enough to organize the dramatic society and then joined the faculty of Columbia.

"How did your course come to be established?" Dr. Freeburg was asked.

"Simply because people from all parts of the country wrote to the university for information about work in photoplay technique. Columbia had no such course, but the requests became so numerous that the subject was included in the extension teaching curriculum for 1915.

"I think I may say that it has proved popular. Last summer I had sixty students, representing twenty different states. Many of my pupils are novelists, short story writers, and professional men and women generally. They are all adults and take their work as it should be taken—seriously.

"I try to strike an effective balance in my lectures between the theoretical (so-called) and the practical. In my advanced course, for example, I speak upon 'Commercial Ideals,' 'The Psychology of the Cinema Audience,' 'The Progression of Tableaux,' 'Dramatizing the Setting,' 'Symbolism,' and 'Character Delineation.'

"Periodically, I have parts of films run off as a basis for discussion among the members of the class. This is done in the projection room of the School of Journalism, which has a fully equipped motion picture apparatus.

"My students submit scenarios and criticisms of photoplays as part of their work.

"Within ten days I will have a report from every member of the class on William Fox's 'A Daughter of the Gods.' Each of my students has been asked to reconstruct the picture from beginning to end as a class exercise. The Kellermann picture is the first big production which has been used as a subject for this difficult treatment.

"Nearly every week my students visit a moving picture theater in the afternoon and evening, to get the reactions of the audiences to the photoplay being exhibited. In the afternoon there are more women and children; in the evening, more men.

"We discuss the results, and attempt by this method to solve the mystery of visual appeal.

"All of us return many times to the Metropolitan Museum of Art to look again and again at the same paintings and the same pieces of sculpture. Why? Because they have a visual appeal which is fascinating and irresistible. I try to discover, with my pupils' aid, what this visual appeal is.

"Why not apply, then, the same principles which hold for painting and sculpture to the photoplay, which is also a visual art?

"This leads me to say that the screen play is not to be regarded as a variant of the stage, if you please, although dozens of dramatic critics are convinced that the contrary is true. The photoplay has its own field, its own limitations, its own methods. It appeals through the eye, the stage play through the ear. What difference could be more fundamental?"

Some people may be surprised to find that Professor Freeburg believes that Theda Bara and other vampires are a potent influence for good.

"Let me tell you why Miss Bara is doing a beneficent work," continued Dr. Freeburg, "or rather, let me tell you first why she carries such a tremendous appeal, why her hold on the moving picture audience is so firm.

"There is the same definite psychology to apply to every audience in every motion picture theater. If the character on the screen is true, and if her portrayal is clearly realistic her sufferings arouse a feeling of pain in the spectators; her joys are shared by the spectators; her dangers are dangers which each person in the audience must undergo.

"These things are so if the actress does her work well. Consequently, when you see a vampire in the grip of the villain you sympathize with her.

"In other words, the audience reacts always to what I choose to designate as the social emotion.

"Most girls are good, but good girls do not want to see other good girls upon the screen. There's no interest, no fascination in that for them.

"This is another reason for the success of the type represented by Theda Bara. She shows them something different, vastly different, from the life they know. The screen good girl is merely her counterpart, magnified perhaps.

"So it is that most moving picture audiences want enjoyment by contrast. They experience new sensations, because for the moment they have projected themselves into the character before them. Few are either daring enough or desirous enough of leading a 'vampire' existence but through the medium of the vampire of the screen they can do her deeds and live her life.

"Their emotions are enriched by just that much.

"In the same spirit we go to witness a prize fight. You pick your favorite between Battling Bill and Fighting Frank. You choose Bill to win. Every time that Bill batters Frank, you batter him, and every time Frank is punched, you, too, are punched, in imagination.

"Your emotions are so far your master, that you are no longer yourself, if you please. For the greater part we get our experience through the experiences of others. Vicariously, I term it.

"It is right to show crime upon the screen," Dr. Freeburg continued.

"This follows as a corollary from what I said concerning Miss Bara. You get the sympathy of the audience and that is absolutely the only means by which you can ever accomplish prison reform.

"Here, again, the photoplay arouses what I called the social emotion. And you can work to better the criminal's condition and the criminal himself, only as you sympathize with him.

"You can't shake your fist in the prisoner's face and shout: 'We've got you now, you scoundrel, and we're going to make you pay for what you have done.'

"It's about as the Englishman said: 'That won't do, you know.'

"The photoplay is, of course, an appeal to the emotion practically without exception. Few films are designed to appeal to the intellect. Understand, I do not mean this as a slur at all. Every audience is more emotional than intellectual while in the theater. People go to the picture to have their emotions stirred.

"If they craved intellectual entertainment they could stay by the fire in their library and read. That is why Shaw, who appeals to the intellect primarily, is read much more than he's seen on the stage.

"Plays which many think appeal to their intellects really appeal to the emotion.

"Such a play was 'Justice.' Galsworthy gave a powerful presentation of the prison problem but he suggested no solution. You saw Falder hammer bitterly on his cell door as the horrors of the night began to oppress his imagination.

"Your emotions surged up within you. As Falder paced faster and faster the length of his narrow cell, you did the same in your imagination.

"After the play was over, however, and all was said and done, all that you knew was how terrible it must be to remain caged.

"One thing more, please. The entire explanation of a child's fondness for a thrilling bed-time story lies in the demons and fairies which he conjures up with every sentence. As he creeps into bed he fancies that every shadow is ready to clutch him. The strength of his own imagination is what makes the story fascinating.

"So I want to urge earnestly upon motion picture producers: For heaven's sake, leave something to the imagination. The photoplay, the audience, and the producer will benefit."

Dr. Freeburg has started a photoplay museum in Columbia for preserving films, "stills," scenarios of important production, and card catalogues of pictures produced.

"EXTRAS" BOYCOTT AGENTS

Union of "Supers" to Protect Their Interests and Eliminate the Exorbitant Charge Made by Agents

The Motion Picture Extras' Association, the "supers" union, has struck against the exorbitant charges which have been made by the agents and are going to protect their own interests and boycott the middleman.

The organization now has 736 members, nearly half of them women. These members are indispensable to the film companies as they represent the trained extras used in mobs, crowds, armies, and so forth.

For years these supers have been forced to submit to exorbitant charges of agents, often as high as forty and fifty per cent of their wages being demanded. They have, therefore, decided that the agent must be eliminated and hereafter the film producer in need of a number of extras will have to call at the headquarters of the association and make his request direct to the officers of the union. In this way the profits of the middleman will be eliminated and the supers, apart from a slight commission they will give to their union, will receive full pay for their work.

The union also proposes to fix a scale of prices for its members. Where in the past horsemen have been paid $5 a day for their work the union will demand $7.50 for each player. Wages for the other players will be fixed on the same basis and the union will insist that the producers pay or go without trained supers. All the members of the association are trained as they are not eligible to membership until they have had six months' experience before the camera.

Two departments, distinct from the main organization, already have been formed. There is the Youth and Beauty Dances Department, which will be under the direction of Hazel May Hall. This department will be prepared at all times to supply girls ranging in ages from 18 to 20, who will be used in cabaret and dance scenes.

The Rough Riders and Soldiers Department will be directed by Captain Eldred of the Forty-seventh Regiment of Brooklyn.

"The Birth of Australia"

By Blennes Hassett,
Special representative of Motography in Australia.

Jack Gavin, head of the Famous Feature Company, of Sydney, Australia, and producer of the "Martydom of Nurse Cavill," and the feature, "The Revue Girls," is about to start upon a huge Australian production, entitled "The Birth of Australia."

"This will be by far the most ambitious effort ever attempted by an Australian," said Jack Gavin on being interviewed by Motography's representative. "The picture will be in ten reels, and sixty-three principals will be used. One thousand supernumeraries will be required to represent the huge crowds which the manuscript calls for. The filming of the production will take four to five months, and the events to be portrayed will cover practically every important event in the history of Australia, from the landing of Captain Cook, to the brave deeds at the Dardanelles and the present European campaign."

Adventure Series for International

NEW THRILLERS TO BE RELEASED ON THE FIFTEENTH OF EACH MONTH

THE International Film Service, Inc., announces that in addition to the Golden Eagle Features which are released about the first of each month it will issue an Adventure Series, in five and six reels each, about the fifteenth of each month. It promises that this Adventure Series will furnish the most thrilling, exciting and at the same time entertaining and educational pictures that can be produced.

The first of the Adventures Series will be "The Jockey of Death," a photoplay in five reels which will be released November 15. This is a play of the circus and the two principals are Mlle. Evelyn and M. Arturo, both of whom deserted the sawdust ring for the screen. Mlle. Evelyn was a daring aerial artist and M. Arturo a bareback rider.

But even with the principal parts played by such experienced actors, Mlle. Evelyn broke an ankle during one of the scenes. The accident happened while the cameraman was making the picture. The young woman heroically continued until the scene ended, although suffering untold pain.

"The Jockey of Death" contains many thrills furnished by these principals. In one mad flight they dive from a high railroad bridge; crawl onto a passing barge over the propeller; scale the trusses of another bridge; and as a thrilling climax ride on a wire across a wide river.

"Patria" Released December 4

"Patria," the preparedness photoplay serial of the International, with Mrs. Vernon Castle in the title role, will be released throughout the United States on Monday, December 4th. "Patria" has been many months in the making.

It was conceived for the dual purpose of furnishing the highest quality of photoplay entertainment possible, and of instilling into the American public the deep obligation of preparing the country against invasion. Nothing has been left undone to accomplish these purposes.

Louis Joseph Vance wrote "Patria," in which he has welded together in a series of episodes a story of remarkable interest.

Mrs. Castle, as Patria, has amazed even her greatest admirers by her remarkable impersonation of the part. Internationally known as a dancer and beauty, she possesses ability as an actress that could be best demonstrated by the impersonation of Patria.

The International has surrounded Mrs. Castle with a strong cast. Foremost in her support is Milton Sills, one of the foremost American actors, who plays Donald Parr; Warner Oland, who appears as the scheming Baron Huroki; and Dorothy Green, who plays the part of Fannie Adair, an accomplice of the plotters. Mr. Sills is best known in motion pictures for his work in "Deep Purple;" "Under Southern Skies;" "A Woman Who Lied;" "The Rack," and "The Honor System." As a legitimate actor, he won fame as leading man in "Just Boys;" "The Law of the Land," and "Panthea."

Mr. Oland is known as one of the most finished actors in the profession. Before he became a screen actor, he played "heavies," with Viola Allen, Sothern and Marlowe, Nazimova and in "A Fool There Was," and "The Yellow Ticket." His greatest previous work as a moving picture actor has been with Theda Bara.

Miss Green is famous for her "vampire" characterizations. She has had many successes, the most notable recent ones having been "The Devil at His Elbow," "Souls Aflame," "Parisian Romance," "The Spirit of the Poppy," and "Women and Wine."

"Lass of the Lumberlands" Opens

In many theaters of the large cities of the country Helen Holmes' new fifteen-chapter thrill picture, "A Lass of the Lumberlands," had its first chapter showing on October 23, and managers report it was given "a critical and flattering reception." The Pantages circuit of vaudeville and moving picture houses opened its new Minneapolis theater on October 28 with the serial.

The consensus of the opinion of managers who have shown the opening chapter and viewed privately the second chapter, is this:

"The picture has two uncommonly strong drawing points. One is that it features the star Helen Holmes and such widely known supporting players as Thomas C. Lingham, Paul Hurst, Leo Maloney, William Behrens and William Brunton in situations of physical peril which thrill the audience. The other is that it shows for the first time in the history of moving pictures the gigantic timbering interest in the making—the felling of huge trees, how they are dragged to streamside, how they are floated to mill, how log jams form and are dislodged by dynamite exploded under the water, how the logs are ripped into lumber at the mills, and the transportation of the commercial product to market to help make the houses we live in. 'A Lass of the Lumberlands' is a gripping story of human nature grappling with nature to win wealth and power, a story of strike and passion, of greed and gain, of courage and cowardice, and there is an inviting promise of a strong love plot to come."

Helen Holmes, former locomotive engineer, is captain of her own exclusive river yacht in "A Lass of the Lumberlands," Signal-Mutual's new serial.

SIX FEATURES FOR PATHE

Astra, Thanhouser, Balboa and Arrow Producing Series for Pathe Which Are Proving Record Breakers

On Pathe's one-a-week Gold Rooster Program are six series of features which are breaking box office receipts.

Each of these series is radically different from any other so that the exhibitor is sure to receive a program that is certain never to be monotonous through similarity or stale from repetition.

The first series is the Astra features produced from the great stage successes of Al. H. Woods and Henry W. Savage. Instead of engaging some one star for this series, the Astra Film Corporation secures the stars who are best suited to play the leads in each play.

Among the successes already released on this series are "At Bay," with Florence Reed as the star; "Madame X" with Dorothy Donnelly; "New York" with Florence Reed and Fania Marinoff; "Big Jim Garrity" with Eleanor Woodruff and Robert Edeson; and "The Test" with Jane Grey. In the near future, "The Challenge" with Helen Chadwick; "Kick In" with Molly King; and "The Yellow Ticket" with a famous star will be released.

The first of the Thanhouser-Gladys Hulette series was "The Shine Girl." Miss Hulette's second vehicle play was "Prudence, the Pirate." It was directed by William Parke, formerly Mansfield's stage director, from the scenario by Agnes C. Johnston.

First run exhibitors are now waiting with a great deal of interest the third of this series, which will be "Her New York," released about the first of the year.

Everyone knows the Baby Marie Osborne series, produced by Balboa. The picture played to big business and to date, only a few features have been booked and re-booked as many times. The release date of "Shadows and Sunshine," the next of this series is November 12. Though this feature has not yet been announced to the public, exhibitors report many inquiries for the next Baby Marie Osborne picture.

"The Light That Failed" is the first of the Kipling releases. Some others are promised for the near future.

The Florence LaBadie series produced by Thanhouser include "The Fugitive," "The Fear of Poverty," and "Saint, Devil and Woman."

The Arrow Film Corporation, which produced "The Woman's Law" is now starting the production of some splendid features, which will be announced later. Dr. W. E. Shallenberger, president, is personally supervising these productions.

Rights for Unusual Feature Selling

Louis Weiss, who left New York on October 22 for an extended trip through the West representing the Moral Uplift Society of America in handling the six-reel feature, "It May Be Your Daughter," has been meeting with unusual success in placing the picture.

In Cleveland he closed a deal with a new company which was organized to handle the film and which is to be known as the Eagle Film Company. P. A. Bloch, who is at present manager of the World Cleveland office, has resigned from that position to exploit the new feature in Ohio and Kentucky. Mr. Weiss also stopped at Detroit on his way to Chicago. The new film was shown to Exhibitor George W. Weeks, who immediately purchased the rights for the state of Michigan. He gave as his opinion that "It May Be Your Daughter" will make more money for him than did even "Where Are My Children?"

In Chicago Mr. Weiss immediately closed a deal with W. E. Laing of the Scenic Theater and C. H. Hayes of the Western Film Company of Sioux City, Iowa. The purchase was made on Friday and the opening made at Sioux City on Monday, a very unusual record in advertising and exploitation. The newspapers were bought up to take the place of the usual paper.

Mr. Weiss will remain in Chicago for a few days satisfying other demands for the striking feature. The film deals with the "white slave" question.

William Sheer Again With Fox

William M. Sheer, actor, vaudevillian, jockey, and casting director, who did such notable work as Skinny, the rat, the character lead in "The Regeneration," has rejoined the William Fox photoplayers.

Mr. Sheer is cast for a leading role in the Gladys Coburn film now in work. It was Mr. Sheer who gained the plaudits of thousands of movie fans by swinging hand over hand in "The Regeneration" on a clothesline a hundred feet in the air and then hurtled downward bouncing off one line and another as he fell.

Mr. Sheer will also be recalled for his feat in setting fire to the excursion barge, Andrew M. Church, which William Fox had purchased for destruction in the picture.

New "Civilization" Rights Sold

Hiller & Wilk, Inc., acting for The A. G. Fontana Productions, Inc., closed a big deal with Thos. H. Ince for "Civilization" in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, West Virginia, and District of Columbia. The price approximates a quarter of a million dollars.

Branch offices will be opened by The A. G. Fontana Productions, Inc., in Cincinnati, Cleveland, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia, while the home office will be located in the Longacre building, New York.

The Selig-Tribune, the twice a week news reel, released through General Film service, has instituted a new department of fashions.

Exhibitor's Record Book Issued

BOOK SUGGESTED BY EXHIBITORS PROVIDED FREE BY UNIVERSAL

THE Universal Film Manufacturing Company, following the suggestion made months ago by Frank J. Rembusch, a prominent exhibitor of Shelbyville, Indiana, is adding its quota to the prosperity of the motion picture industry by attempting to persuade exhibitors throughout the country to keep an accurate account of their business receipts and disbursements so that they may strike a trial balance at any moment and show whether they are making or losing money.

For several weeks, with the co-operation of MOTOGRAPHY, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company has been working on a motion picture theater account book. Representatives of the film manufacturing company and of MOTOGRAPHY have been interviewing exhibitors throughout the country for the purpose of ascertaining just exactly what the needs of the exhibitor are in the way of an accurate account book.

Book Suggested by Exhibitors

The account book which has been compiled is a composite form as a result of interviews with numerous exhibitors. It appears to provide for everything necessary to keep the accounts of a motion picture theater.

The book, which contains enough pages to take care of the business of a motion picture theater for fifty-two weeks, is so arranged that a person without any knowledge of bookkeeping may keep the records correctly.

Each page of the book provides for the record of any motion picture theater for seven days. There are special ruled spaces for the exchange booking number, title of picture, star featured, number of reels and the brand. There also are spaces for the film rental cost and the poster and advertising cost.

The ticket sales are provided for with special ruled spaces which will show the sales at both day and night performances. They are so arranged that different priced ticket sales will show with the amount of money received from each class of admissions.

On each page there also is a recapitulation showing the expense items and the income items. The final entry on each page is "Profit-Loss," which should be filled in with the proper figures as obtained from the previous figures entered on the sheet.

Book Fills Real Need

The record book, the result of the combined labors of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and MOTOGRAPHY, is something for which the trade has been seeking for many years. It is the record that will tend to place the industry on a thorough business basis with very little effort on the part of the theater manager. It is a record that will be of tremendous value to the successful men in the industry and will show the unsuccessful why they should not seek to continue.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has compiled this record book for the good of every exhibitor in North America.

It makes no difference if the exhibitor uses the Universal program, or if he uses films made by some other manufacturer, he is entitled to a record book if he will simply ask for it. There are absolutely no "strings" attached to this offer.

On another page of this issue of MOTOGRAPHY, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company has taken a page advertisement offering this record book to all exhibitors, absolutely without cost. All that is necessary is to sign the coupon accompanying the advertisement, slip it into an envelope and mail it to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, 1600 Broadway, New York City. The coupons must be mailed to the home office direct where the supply of record books are kept. Orders will not be filled from Universal branch exchanges.

MOTOGRAPHY has received a copy of the record book. It is something that every exhibitor in the country can use to great advantage. If he contemplates selling his theater and has been successful the records kept in this book will enable him to get all the house is worth.

Owners of syndicate houses should send a request for the record book for every one of their theaters. These syndicate house owners should see that their managers keep the record book accurately and the reports of the managers should be copies from the pages of the record book. The Universal Company is prepared to furnish the syndicate house owners with a record book for each house.

The "Two Romeos" Playing Texas

By S. G. PARKER,
Special Correspondent for MOTOGRAPHY

The two "Romeos," as they have already been dubbed in exhibiting circles in the Southwest—meaning the Fox and Metro version of "Romeo and Juliet"—have been playing Texas towns simultaneously.

Some weeks ago, several exhibitors having either the one or the other booked, began to get anxious about his competition booking the other; but the same is true as was the result with both "Carmen's"—business for each film version has been greater than it would probably have been otherwise.

In Dallas, the Queen Theater played the Metro production, with Francis X. Bushman and Beverley Bayne—while at the same time, a few doors away, the Jefferson was playing the Fox version with Harry Hilliard and Theda Bara in the title roles. The advertising matter put out by each house claims "the original Romeo and Juliet," but aside from a line like this, no other reference was made to competition.

It is a fact that had either house been forced to care for the patronage to both theaters during the showing of this production neither of them could have accomodated the crowds. Both theaters drew big business, and it is rumored that both are considering playing return engagements a little later. Rumor does not state whether they will play them "together" the next time, however.

In Houston, the Isis played the Fox version while the Metro offering was screened for the public at the Queen. The same result as in Dallas—both houses doing an excellent business.

The Isis at Houston and the Jefferson at Dallas play both Fox and Metro programs—while the Queens at Dallas and Houston—play Triangle and Paramount mostly.

Soft Strains Please Critics' Ear

Music with the pictures was introduced by Vitagraph at the press exhibition of "The Devil's Prize" at the offices of the company at 1600 Broadway, New York. The reviewers have often been heard to remark that music with the pictures would be most desirable and Vitagraph is to be congratulated for being the pioneer in doing this. A number of reviewers were interviewed after the show and all those spoken to by a special representative expressed the hope that the practice would be continued and become general, because a musician's time is valuable and as a consequence the press shows are sure to start not later than fifteen minutes after the hour appointed

Artcraft Film to Open Coast Houses

EDWARD J. HOWE HAS COMPLETED ELABORATE SCORE FOR PICKFORD PICTURE

TO Mary Pickford and the Artcraft Pictures Corporation has been accorded the honor of opening many big new houses on the Pacific coast. At least six mammoth picture palaces are now projected or in process of construction in this territory and Mr. Kane, the Artcraft Pacific coast representative, reports that all of them have announced that Mary Pickford will dedicate them to the new art industry. One of the first to open will be the T. & D. in Oakland, a house seating 4,000 persons. Miss Pickford's,full week there in "Less Than the Dust" is scheduled for November 26, which will serve as the formal opening.

Others of this section include the $350,000 California Theater which Eugene Roth is erecting in San Francisco; W. H. Clune's new Los Angeles house, to be erected at the cost of $500,000; a 1,500-seat house, the Cline, built by the King-Reavis Amusement Company in Santa Rosa; Turner & Dahnken's 2,400-seat theater in Stockton; Jensen & von Herberg's Beauty Theater in Butte, which will be completed in December; the 2,300 Coliseum in Seattle, opened last January, and the Columbia in Portland, over the destinies of which Jensen and von Herberg preside.

Canada Inerested in Pickford Films

The Canadian invasion of the new Mary Pickford productions presented by Artcraft Pictures Corporation took a boom last week when the Regent Theater in Toronto and the Dominion in Winnipeg signed with the Monarch Film Company, Ltd., for "Less Than the Dust," each for a week's showing. The Monarch is handling the entire Dominion of Canada for Artcraft Pictures Corporation, Ltd., 12 Queen street, East, and reports that interest in the new Pickford pictures is running at high tide from Halifax to Vancouver.

In the states the pile of contracts at the Artcraft offices, 729 Seventh avenue, New York, mounts steadily higher. There is no longer any question about the ability of the exchange managers to keep eighty prints busy; the problem is to make this huge number cover the territory to the satisfaction of clamoring exhibitors. No territory has a monopoly on first run privileges; the demand for the first productions of Mary Pickford's own company appears to have been limited only by the number of progressive exhibitors in the United States.

Mr. Humpty Dumpty wasn't the only illustrous personage who ever sat on a wall and the tragedy of his sad end was nothing compared to what it would be if Little Mary should fall off and hurt herself. This unmoving picture was taken during the filming of her first very own production, "Less Than the Dust," about to be released by Artcraft.

Howe Completes Musical Score

Edward J. Howe has completed the elaborate musical score which Mary Pickford insisted should be a feature of "Less Than the Dust." Mr. Howe divided his time last week between the projection room and his studio, putting the final touches on his music and perfectly synchronizing his themes with the action of the picture. Those who have heard Mr. Howe's music declare that his "Less Than the Dust" composition is appropriate in every detail to the mysticism and superstition of the far East and portrays beyond criticism the atmosphere of a small village of modern India.

Many weeks the composer has devoted to the task for which he was selected by Mary Pickford. She had returned from Chicago full of enthusiasm for a genuine crusade in behalf of better music for motion picture plays, an enthusiasm born of having heard the Chicago Symphony play the harmonies arranged for one of her previous pictures, a much shorter and less pretentious production than she now aspires to make under her own artistic guidance. She knew of Mr. Howe, and he was her first and only choice in the composition and arrangement of the "Less Than the Dust" score, which is now being completed by G. Schirmer (Inc.) for distribution to the eighty theaters in which the new Pickford pictures will be seen immediately upon its release

Mr. Howe is loud in his praise of the new Schirmer method by which complete orchestration of his score can be finished in a few days. It was with this knowledge that he had the ablest mechanical assistance that he went ahead laboriously to rebuild his symphony in the spirit of Laurence Hope's "India's Love Lyrics," to which Hector Turnbull credits his inspiration for the plot of "Less Than the Dust."

Metro's "Romeo and Juliet" Praised

FRANCIS BUSHMAN AND BEVERLY BAYNE APPEAR AT BROADWAY THEATER

ON the second night of the showing of Metro's production of "Romeo and Juliet," with Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne in the title roles, at the Broadway Theater, New York, the headliners appeared in person and were literally mobbed by the throngs of admirers. Helen Dunbar, who plays the part of Lady Capulet in the production, accompanied the stars. As the players entered a box the spectators recognized them and applauded with such vigor that Samuel H. Berg, who composed the musical setting for the Metro production, dragged them onto the stage. Instantly there were cries for a speech, to which Mr. Bushman and Miss Bayne both responded.

At the conclusion of the performance Mr. Bushman and Miss Bayne were literally mobbed by the crowds. Floral tributes which had been showered upon them were first carried out to their automobile. When the two stars, with Miss Dunbar, appeared in the lobby, crowds swarmed around them and almost carried the two to the machine.

Although it was an epoch-making night in motion pictures, it demonstrated that the American people admire Shakespeare on as well as off the screen, and that they stand ready to idolize the stars who successfully interpret in motion pictures the work of the "Bard of Avon."

This demonstration was typical of the success which "Romeo and Juliet" has met all over the country. The majority of the critics are enthusiastic in their praise of the production. The beauty of the play is enhanced by the excellent musical score composed for this production by Iréneé Bergé and Samuel Berg. The music was taken from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" and Tschadkowsky's symphonic overture.

At the Rialto Theater, Denver, Colorado, the presentation of "Romeo and Juliet" was received so well that the manager booked the film for an indefinite engagement. At the Schenley Theater, Pittsburg, the Metro production was shown to capacity audiences for an entire week. The manager of the New Theater, Baltimore, Maryland, booked it for two weeks.

Reports from the Strand, Washington, D. C.; the Victoria Theater, Philadelphia; the Alcazar, Chattanooga, Tenn.; the Trianon Theater, Birmingham, Ala.; Palace, Des Moines; Regent Theater, Indianapolis; Alhambra, Toledo; and the Walnut Street Theater, Cincinnati, indicate tremendous business and unstinted praise. At the latter theater after the first showing the picture was booked for a second week.

The same condition prevails in the smaller cities where the film has been presented and the demands for booking are pouring in daily to the Metro exchanges.

Emily Stevens in "The Wager"

The Metro Pictures Corporation announces the Metro-Rolfe production of "The Wager," with Emily Stevens as the star, for release November 13. Other motion picture productions of this dramatic star include "The Wheel of the Law," "Destiny, or the Soul of a Woman," and "The House of Tears."

Miss Stevens in "The Wager" is supported by a cast containing Lyster Chambers ("Slippery Jim"), Daniel Jarrett, Frank Currier and Charles Bowser. It is one of the strongest Metro-Rolfe plays yet released.

George D. Baker is the author of "The Wager." He also directed the production.

Christmas Club Play

Further evidence of the wide scope of motion pictures is demonstrated in a picture now being made at the Metro-Popular Plays and Players studio to develop the savings instinct and to teach frugality in families of moderate means. It will be released broadcast throughout the country before the holidays. The film is being taken under the direction of Burton L. King, with Violet Heming and William Courtleigh in the leading roles for the Christmas Club.

Wallace C. Clifton has written a story for the screen called "Three Christmases," showing how a family suffered before the beginning of the Christmas Club and the effects after the habit of putting away a small amount each week had been started.

Here's the crowd and the reason for it. The house: the Broadway, New York. The picture: Metro's "Romeo and Juliet," with Bushman and Bayne.

Two More Planks

The following two expressions concerning censorship of pictures are the last of those given to Motography by candidates for Illinois state offices at the present election. The other "picture planks" produced by Motography's complete canvass were published in the two preceding issues.

Mt. Vernon, Illinois, Oct. 31, 1916.

Motography, Chicago:

In answer to your question relative to the regulation of motion pictures by a State Board of Censors, I desire to state that I am opposed to the creation of any further commissions or boards at the expense of the tax payers of Illinois. The people of this state will censor all undesirable films exhibited by withholding their patronage. Very respectfully yours,

Louis L. Emmerson, Republican Candidate for Secretary of State.

Carrollton, Ill., Oct. 25, 1916.

Motography, Chicago:

I have your letter of October 19th before me, and in reply will say that I am not at the present time at all familiar with the motion picture business.

I have been a business man of Carrollton for 25 years, and assure you that I will, if elected, do what I think is for the best interests of all concerned, after informing myself on the matter. One thing I want you to know is that I am not trying to evade any question on legislation on any matter that is laid before me. Before I would vote on any measure, all parties would be given a full hearing.

S. Elmer Simpson, Republican Candidate for State Senator, 38th Senatorial District.

Schenck-Talmadge Nuptials

The wedding of Joseph M. Schenck, general booking manager of the Marcus Loew circuit and affiliated theaters, will be married to Norma Talmadge, of the Norma Talmadge Film Corporation, next week at Stamford, Conn.

There will be no happy honeymoon for the present as Miss Talmadge is now working in a film that will require her services for some time, and after that she is under contract to make other pictures for the company which is controlled by her fiance.

New San Francisco Office

Commodious executive offices have been opened in the Humboldt Bank Building, San Francisco, by the De Luxe Film Lasky Corporation for the distribution of high class productions, mainly state right features and spectacles that are too big for the program. Good comedies and educational fillers of the better class will also be distributed.

Carter De Haven is now directing his own company and playing the lead in a two-reel comedy, "Her Man Friday."

World Releases "Bought and Paid For"

ORIGINAL DRAMA MARKED THE OPENING OF WILLIAM A. BRADY'S PLAYHOUSE

"BOUGHT AND PAID FOR," the film version of which will be released by the World Film Corporation on November 13 with Alice Brady as its star, was the first production at William A. Brady's Playhouse in New York, where it continued for two winters and one summer without a break. When this play was originally produced many thousands of dollars were spent in a nationwide advertising campaign. The effects of this widespread advertising will undoubtedly be felt by the film. Because of the great success of the drama on the legitimate stage it is familiar to almost everyone in the country and there will be general interest in the motion picture release. George Broadhurst, the author of the drama, has expressed himself as very much pleased with the picturization of this play and prophesies for the film a success equal to that of the play both in this country and abroad.

In addition to the list of picture plays already published, to be released between the present time and the end of May, 1917, the World Film Corporation's production directors are actively at work upon three dramas simultaneously. These are "A Law Unto Herself," with Travers Vale in charge; "The Parasites," directed by Harley Knoles, and "The Bondage of Fear," which is being "put on" by Harry Davenport.

In the last mentioned piece Robert Warwick is the star, with Gail Kane in the opposite role. In "A Law Unto Herself" the cast is headed by Ethel Clayton and includes Arthur Ashley, John Bowers, Montagu Love, Edward Kimball and others. Carlyle Blackwell, June Elvidge, Muriel Ostriche, Charlotte Granville and Henry Hull are acting the big roles in "The Parasites."

"Frou Frou," the last of the World-Brady plays previously bulletined, is completed, under the direction of Emile Chautard. Alice Brady is the star, and the support embraces Gerda Holmes, George McQuarrie, Edward Langford and Alec B. Francis. This drama was a very great success when produced on the speaking stage by the late Augustin Daly.

It will be released May 29 and the entire schedule will be maintained as officially announced three weeks ago.

On Wednesday evening of last week Lew Fields and the entire company supporting him in the musical comedy "Step This Way" availed themselves of an opportunity to see Mr. Fields in the World-Brady screen play, "The Man Who Stood Still." This, by the way, was the first time Mr. Fields had observed the picture.

When his work in "The Man Who Stood Still" was completed, the actor started out immediately upon his road tour and has not been within striking distance of New York at any time since. Last week the comedian was in St. Louis with his musical piece, and it occurred to George W. Fuller, the World Film Corporation's manager in that city, that it would be a nice compliment to invite Mr. Fields and his stage associates to view the picture.

William Sievers, manager of the Grand Central Theater, where "The Man Who Stood Still" was booked but had not been shown, assented to the plan, and the after-theater party was duly held.

"The Man Who Stood Still," besides the widely known comedian, presents a young girl who is fast becoming a big favorite with motion picture followers the world over. This girl is little eighteen-year-old Doris Kenyon, who has appeared in World productions exclusively since her entrance into pictures not so very long ago.

Nine Productions Under Way

CRITICS LAUD "A DAUGHTER OF THE GODS"

The young lady in the circumference needs no introduction. You've had her in your house very often. Far from vampiring, her latest artistic efforts were in "Romeo and Juliet," Shakespeare's love drama, just produced by Fox. She is overlooking one scene in the play.

Below, Annette Kellermann harums in the Solomon scene from "A Daughter of the Gods," which is now charming big crowds in New York.

NINE different productions, five in the east and four in the west, are being filmed now by William Fox's directorial staff.

The stars acting in the New Jersey studios are Theda Bara, June Caprice, Virginia Pearson, Valeska Suratt and Gladys Coburn; across the continent, William Farnum, Gladys Brockwell, George Walsh, and Alan Hale and Gretchen Hartman, who will be featured together in a forthcoming photoplay.

Miss Bara's picture, one of the most dramatic in which she has yet appeared, will present an extraordinarily capable cast. Chief among her supporting players are Walter Law, Einar Linden, Glen White, John Webb Dillion and Alice Gale, all of whom had prominent roles in William Fox's picturization of "Romeo and Juliet."

Einar Linden, the Paris of the film, was so enchanted by Theda Bara's wonderful eyes that he has written the music for a song dedicated to the distinguished actress, under title of "Those Perilous Eyes."

One of New York's best-known music publishers will soon have the publication on sale. Mr. Linden is not a tyro in this field, by any means, as he wrote both music and libretto for the operetta, "Le Jardinier," and was a noted figure in European grand opera before he came to the legitimate stage.

He has been successively a grand opera tenor, clown, dancer, stage manager, librettist, composer, actor, and moving picture player.

Valeska Suratt's photoplay, under the direction of Will S. Davis is proceeding rapidly. Herbert Heyes has the part opposite the fashion plate of the screen. Others in the cast are Claire Whitney, John Charles, Joseph Granby, Charles Edwards and Oscar Nye.

"Jealousy," a recently completed Suratt screen play, is released by William Fox on November 20.

Virginia Pearson is doing a film which deals in part with prison life. One of the novel studio sets erected for it last week showed the girls' workshop on Blackwell's Island.

The news has come from the West Coast studios that Alan Hale, featured with Gretchen Hartman in an international picture-play, was president of the 1912 Class of Osteopathy in Philadelphia. The versatile Hale was once a protege of Mike Murphy, the famous athletic trainer; and later, a protege of Andreas Dippel. Several well-known United States army officers and hundreds of privates, on duty along the Mexican border, appear in many scenes of the Hale-Hartman photoplay.

Reed Heustis, publicity representative for the Fox Film Corporation on the Pacific Coast, is the author of the scenario which Frank Lloyd has in work for Gladys Brockwell.

Critics Sanction Fox Spectacle

William Fox's million dollar Kellermann photoplay, "A Daughter of the Gods," the picture beautiful, has been acknowledged by the country's foremost dramatic critics as unsurpassed in the annals of screen artistry.

This production is now showing in New York, Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. It has been received in each of these cities as an epochal film.

Here are some opinions about it:

Unsurpassable. Anyone who is not willing to admit that it is one of the finest things yet produced is not fit to criticize motion picture work as a fine art.—New York Journal.

Colossal in its magnificence.—Brooklyn Times.

A cinema that will have to be seen by all.—New York Evening Sun.

BEECROFT RESIGNS

Eastern Representative of American Film Company Withdraws to Enter Field of Distributing United States Films Abroad

The resignation of Chester Beecroft as eastern representative of the American Film Company, is announced from that company's office. The step was taken by Mr. Beecroft to enable him to put into independent action a plan of foreign distribution which will bring maximum returns to the manufacturer.

Chester Beecroft, who will connect American films with foreign screens

Mr. Beecroft's new connection is with the Overseas Distributing Company of America, an organization which has made arrangements to market American Film Company-Mutual productions abroad through the foremost foreign distributors. Mr. Beecroft will also continue to handle the sale of the Chaplin-Mutual pictures in foreign countries and will in addition deal in the product of any other high-class film companies looking for the widest foreign market. The proposition is worked out on a bigger and broader scale than has been applied before in marketing films abroad and every indication is that it will be a huge financial success. Mr. Beecroft will be located for the present at 71 West Twenty-third street, New York.

Harry H. Poppe and Eleanor O'Keefe, who were associated with Mr. Beecroft during his term as general manager for David Horsley, and who have been with him in the American Film Company's office, will go along with him in his new venture.

Chester Beecroft has been a brilliant success since his entry into the film business. He first drew attention as advertising manager of the Patents Company, the first great combination in the business. Later he was advertising and publicity manager of the all powerful General Film Company.

Later Mr. Beecroft wrote publicity and advertising matter for David Horsley, aiding the latter in building up his business.

Appreciating the value of his services, Mr. Horsley appointed Mr. Beecroft his general manager, an office which he handled with such good judgment that John R. Freuler offered him the post of the New York representative of the American Film Company and full charge of the American-Mutual and Chaplin-Mutual export business.

One of his notable achievements in this position was the sale of the rights to the Mutual-Chaplin releases in the United Kingdom for a sum equal to more than half of the total salary the Lone Star Company is paying the famous comedian.

CALIFORNIA ADAPTS "FAUST"

Filming of the Opera Nearly Completed and Will Be Released Exclusively for "Big Time" Bookings

The California Motion Picture Corporation announces that its big film adaptation of the opera "Faust" is nearing completion and will be released for indefinite runs this winter in several of the leading cities of the country. It is an elaborate production intended exclusively for "big time" bookings.

The scenario is from the pen of Captain Leslie T Peacocke. The adaptation, according to the producers, religiously follows Goethe's original and Gounod's operatic versions.

The star of the production is Beatriz Michelena, the prima donna, whose insistency ever since her screen debut, that the greatest of the operas be adequately produced in film version, is largely responsible for the present endeavor. As Marguerite, Miss Michelena will find it necessary to add a new type to her already long and diversified list of motion picture heroines.

Something of the demand that is said to have been made upon Miss Michelena's talent and emotional responsiveness, may be gathered from the fact that the big theme of the screen story is Marguerite's fall from innocence, her tribulations, as pictured in Goethe's poem, and her final redemption. While thoroughly classical in atmosphere, the "Faust" motion picture, like the original story, is replete with tense situation and the proverbial "punch" of the accepted film production.

Sending Shows to Soldiers

For the last month, the Mutual Film Corporation has been furnishing a daily program of films to the Twentieth Infantry at Fort Bliss, Texas.

This was done at the special request of Chaplain John T. Axton, who for three years has used Mutual programs exclusively in the nightly entertainments offered the men of the Fort Bliss and neighboring posts.

In a letter expressing his appreciation of the Mutual's kindness, Chaplain Axton says the regulars of the United States army truly appreciate anything done for them, since the attention of the public has been focused on the national guard camps and the regulars have been neglected.

"We have used the Mutual service for nearly three years, writes Chaplain Axton, "giving our men a free program every night, inviting as many neighboring troops as cared to enjoy it, so that we exhibited to acres of men. The funds have been contributed by interested friends and by the men. The government makes no appropriation for the purpose."

Selznick-Laemmle-Brenon Associate

TAKE OVER NEW YORK THEATER FOR BIG SCREEN PRODUCTIONS

IN this era of mergers and combinations the latest announcement is the co-operation of Lewis J. Selznick, Carl Laemmle and Herbert Brenon, motion picture producers and heads of three film organizations, who in association with each other have taken over the Broadway Theater at Broadway and Forty-first Street, New York City, and will make it a house of "runs" for famous screen productions.

Owing to the steady production of plays without any increase in the number of Broadway theaters to shelter them, the film magnates with great screen successes on their hands have found themselves barred out of New York unless they consented to book their de luxe features as regular program attractions. This would entail large financial losses.

Such a situation was by no means pleasing to Messrs. Selznick, Laemmle and Brenon, so they successfully negotiated a deal overnight with the Stanley V. Mastbaum interests, of Philadelphia, whereby they obtain almost immediate control of the Broadway. Under its new direction the Broadway will at once be used to give shelter to several striking and costly pictures, each of which is expected to have an extended "run."

The first film drama to open at the Broadway under its new control will be Herbert Brenon's multi-reel presentation of Nazimova in "War Brides," by Marion Craig Wentworth. This is the first production made by Mr. Brenon since he formed his own film corporation. This is also Nazimova's first screen appearance and she has scored a tremendous success with her entry into films. It it the second great production made under the trade name of Selznick-Pictures.

Following the run of "War Brides," Mr. Laemmle will present the Universal Film Corporation's picture, "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea," and Lewis J. Selznick will present his greatest star, Clara Kimball Young, in a multi-reel picturization of "The Foolish Virgin" by Thomas Dixon, author of "The Birth of a Nation."

"War Brides" is certain to create a lot of attention. For timeliness it is one of the greatest plays of the day and hour, it was immensely popular in vaudeville and made Nazimova, the Slavic tragedienne, a greater dramatic factor than she had ever been in her entire previous career.

Herbert Brenon, the producer, has achieved a brilliant success in his direction of Nazimova. It might be added that his greatest producing capacities have been revealed in the making of this work.

An immense amount of money has been spent on "War Brides," but even that is secondary to Mr. Brenon's handling of Nazimova. At a private showing of the picture to an audience composed largely of women, a few days ago, the pictures so affected the onlookers that some of the women came out of the screening room with eyes glistening and with signs of dampness on their cheeks.

"War Brides," as Herbert Brenon has produced it, is the most compelling argument for woman suffrage ever presented on stage or screen. It is likewise a splendid pictorial argument for peace.

Beginning Saturday night, November 11, the Broadway will be redecorated and beautified in appearance. New stage settings will be installed, handsome new fittings put in place. The orchestra will be enlarged and the house staff and ushers given a new and distinctive dress. The opening performance of "War Brides" will be held on Sunday evening, November 12.

Hanover Purchases All Biograph Films

One million five hundred thousand feet of positive film was recently purchased from the American Biograph Company by the Hanover Film Company of New York. Charles E. Kimball and Sam Grant, managing directors of the latter concern, estimate the number of subjects comprising this footage to reach between eight hundred and one thousand. They range in length from split reels to five reel features.

These pictures are library copies of each of the Biograph productions from 1910 to date. Many of them have in their casts four or five people who are today screen stars and directors of international fame. During the period covered by these pictures there were at the Biograph studio such well known stars as Mary Pickford, Mae Marsh, Lillian and Dorothy Gish, Robert Harron, Henry Walthall, etc., and Griffith and Sennett were among their directors.

The Hanover Film Company, located in the Columbia Theater building in New York, will list the titles, lengths and casts of these pictures in a later issue of Motography. As there is only one copy of each production, no restrictions will go with the sale of the prints. They can be shown anywhere by the purchasers, making it a case of "first come first served." And there are lots of these old pictures which can compete with the best on the market today, for they were made when the Biograph Company was in its prime. During the American Biograph Company's early days an exhibitor had only to hang out the AB sign to be sure of a capacity house.

The Girl on the Cover

Bessie Eyton, who in the past few years has become known as one of the most versatile stars in the silent drama, has, by the common consent of those authorities who have been permitted to see private presentations of Sherman-Elliott's "The Crisis," produced by Selig, accomplished the best work in her talented career.

Miss Eyton assumes the role of "Virginia Carvel," the impulsive, pretty, self-willed Southern lassie in Winston Churchill's great story of American life. All through the story of "The Crisis" Miss Eyton's charm and her winsomeness will capture the hearts of audiences everywhere. However, it is not simply the pretty face and whole-hearted charm of Bessie Eyton that will attract; in several of the climaxes she rises to heights of emotional acting that have seldom been surpassed on the screen.

Her scenes with George W. Fawcett, who so ably enacts the role of "Judge Silas Whipple," will bring both laughter and tears to the eyes of the spectators.

And believe us, there is no more charming figure presented in Filmland than winsome Bessie Eyton in the gowns of a half century ago when hoop skirts were the vogue. Miss Bessie made all her gowns and she also wears some fine old-fashioned cameos.

"WRATH" FIFTH McCLURE PLAY

H. B. Warner Portrays Double Role of Father and Son in This Chapter—Two McClure Players Join Allies

"Wrath," the fifth play of the McClure Series "Seven Deadly Sins," presents Russian bureaucracy, Russian statecraft, Russian mystery, Russian cruelty, Russian chivalry, Russian wrath and Russian tenderness—and these are all portrayed by H. B. Warner, the latest McClure star, who plays the dual role of a Russian grand duke, the chief exemplar of "Wrath," and his son.

This chapter of the series, which is being directed by Theodore Marston, has other remarkable aspects aside from its strange story and setting. There is an interval of sixteen years between the prologue and the main action, and Mr. Warner, in playing his dual role, is called upon to use four separate make-ups.

Motion picture audiences will have an added interest in the characters of Le Compte de Frais and La Baronne d'Arboz, appearing in "Pride," the second play of the McClure series, "Seven Deadly Sins," in which Holbrook Blinn is starred, when they hear that the players who created these parts, Guido Colucci and his wife, Lena D'Avril, are now over the seas doing their bits for the Allies.

Mr. Colucci is an Italian reservist, who before his connection with McClure Pictures, appeared in Metro, World and Ivan pictures. Recently he was featured by Edison in a five-reel feature, "The Tell-Tale Step." Just as he was completing his work in "Pride" he received word that his class had been called to the Italian colors, and he stepped out of his role of count to serve as a common soldier in the ranks.

Lena D'Avril, as his wife is called, is a French girl, and was well known in Paris as a dancer before coming to this country. When her husband marched away she realized that she would rather be with her husband in the shell-swept countries than in America posing before a camera so she went with him and will become a Red Cross nurse.

George Le Guere is sentenced to the death chair in "Greed," the third play of the McClure series, and Nance O'Neill sets to work against tremendous difficulties to rescue him. Mr. Le Guere's hosts of girl admirers will heave deep sighs of relief when the series is completed and the love of Eve Leslie (Shirley Mason) rewards him for risking life and limb to save her from those who would tear her away from him.

Mae Murray and Fannie Ward will hold sway on the Paramount Program for the week of November 13, in the two feature productions "The Plow Girl" and "The Years of the Locust," respectively, both from the Lasky studios.

"The Plow Girl" marks the return of Mae Murray to the Lasky studios, this being the first production she has made since she left the east some weeks ago, after having appeared in the productions of the Famous Players.

Not since the time of "The Cheat." has Fannie Ward had a production in which her wonderful capabilities have been given such sway as in "The Years of the Locust."

Surrounding the program for the week of November 13, Paramount will release four short reel features, the 40th edition of the "magazine-on-the-screen," the Paramount Pictographs; the 41st of the series of "Weekly Trips Around the World" conducted by Burton Holmes, in which he takes his fellow tourists "In Modern Athens;" a Paramount-Bray cartoon by J. R. Bray, "Colonel Heeza Liar Hobo;" and the fourth Black Diamond Single Reel Comedy produced by the United States Picture Corporation, and released by Paramount, "A Villainous Pursuit."

The four subjects of the Paramount Pictograph are "Self Defense Without Weapons," which depends fundamentally upon your ability to startle an assailant before he has the opportunity to do you any bodily harm; "People of the Alaskan Wilderness," the second installment of Prof. George Burbank Shattuck's pictures showing the conditions now existing in the Klondike region; "Have You a Little Heifer in Your Home?" which "back to the land" movement contemplates the keeping of a cow in every home, thereby having your individual milk supply fresh for all meals; and "Frenzied Frocks and Frills," exposing the secrets of the designing rooms of the Parisian modistes.

Burton Holmes takes his travelers to witness the Olympian Games and other unusual European events.

FILMING 'THE GARDEN OF ALLAH'

By Thomas Santschi

Dear Editor: I am not much on writing for publication but, pursuant to your request, I am sending along my observations and experiences in the filming of "The Garden of Allah." It may interest your readers to know that a majority of the photographs were taken by Yours Truly, Tom Santschi.

"The Garden of Allah" produced by Mr. Selig from Robert Hichens' famous novel is the most elaborate film drama that I have ever appeared in and, believe me, I have "worked" in hundreds of film plays. I can also state that I like my role, that of "Boris," better than any other character part I have ever undertaken and this includes both the spoken and the silent drama. May be you don't know that I played in stock for some years before joining the Selig Polyscope Company. I have never been with any other film company.

Mr. Selig instructed Jim Campbell to go as far as he liked in filming "The Garden of Allah" and I, for one, believe the picture is the best that Jim has ever done and I say this with due regard for "The Spoilers," "The Crisis," and the others.

A lot of the spectacular scenes in "The Garden of Allah" were filmed in the Mojave desert in California. It was there that we filmed the sandstorm which for realism will be difficult to surpass. The wind was raised by the planes of a battery of air craft anchored off scene and sawdust was utilized with the sand in making an unusually realistic rain of sand. The charge of the Bedoins was also staged in this desert. This action was rehearsed time and again and it was hard work, I tell you, for men and horses sank ankle deep in the sand.

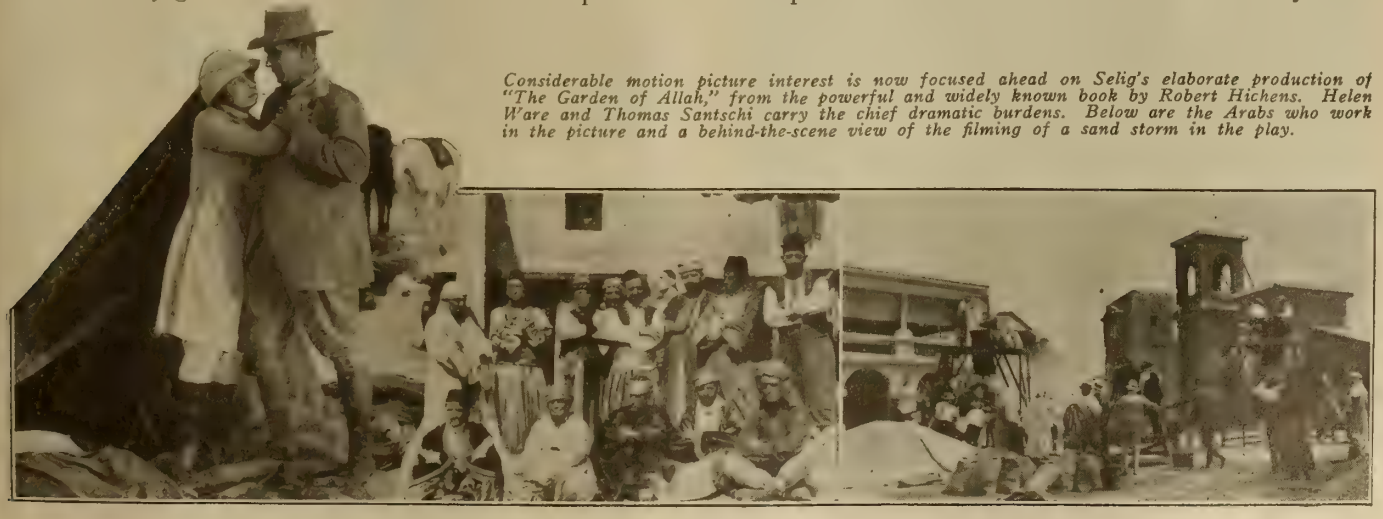
Helen Ware who enacts the part of "Domini" thoroughly enjoyed every moment of the filming of "The Garden of Allah." There were no performances too hazardous or difficult for her to undertake. I am told that she presents some of her most artistic work in this picture. I do know that acting with her is a pleasure and that her wonderful art inspired the entire company to their very best efforts.

I think James Bradbury in the role of the "San Diviner" is very good. He has a wonderful makeup.

When you see the wonderful street scenes of Oriental atmosphere, the mosques, the bazaars, and all, do not think for a moment that this is a "stage scenery." William N. Selig ordered that permanent structures be erected and the towers and buildings of massive stone are really and truly built of stone.

We used about two thousand people in the production of "The Garden of Allah." These include types of Orientals, etc. It was no small task to secure proper costumes for all of these people and even the fire arms used by them were necessarily of Oriental make.

FROHMAN PLACES FILM RIGHTS



Rights on "The Conquest of Canaan" Secured by Hiram Abrams of Paramount, Stanley Mastbaum and Louis Rosenbluh

The Frohman Amusement Corporation this week closed with Hiram Abrams of Paramount for the rights to its latest picture in the California territory controlled by the Lasky Pictures Corporation and covering California, Nevada, Arizona and New Mexico. Hiram Abrams, acting for his own organization, distributing through New England, secured the New England rights to the "Conquest of Canaan," and will give the picture immediate release in that territory. He acted as agent for the Lasky enterprise. "The Conquest of Canaan" will be the initial release of the newly organized Lasky exchange at San Francisco and will be released by that concern about November 2.

Stanley Mastbaum, the Philadelphia magnate, secured the Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, District of Columbia and Delaware territory from the Frohman people for "The Conquest of Canaan," and will issue it as the first important release through a new exchange recently opened there. From the nature of the deal it may result in a permanent arrangement between Frohman and Mastbaum for that concern's handling of the entire Frohman output in their territory.

Louis Rosenbluh, head of Variety Films, Inc., secured New York and northern New Jersey for "The Conquest of Canaan," and has secured an option on the same territory for "The Witching Hour."

President Sherrill of the Frohman concern announces that "The Witching Hour," which is to be a seven-reel picture, is to be shown preferentially to those buyers who secure "The Conquest of Canaan," as it is his intention, if possible, to concentrate each of his productions in one center in each territory.

Considerable motion picture interest is now focused ahead on Selig's elaborate production of "The Garden of Allah," from the powerful and widely known book by Robert Hichens. Helen Ware and Thomas Santschi carry the chief dramatic burdens. Below are the Arabs who work in the picture and a behind-the-scene view of the filming of a sand storm in the play.

Ralph Ince Forms Producing Co.

As announced last week by Motography, Ralph W. Ince has retired from his post as producing director of the Vitagraph Company and will form at once a large company of his own, in order to carry out some plans which he has long had under consideration. With Mr. Ince will go Lucille Lee Stewart and Huntly Gordon, who will lead the new company and share the starring privileges of future "R. W. I." productions.

Ralph W. Ince, who will form a new producing company

There has, Mr. Ince emphatically declares, been no change whatever in the pleasant relations which have always existed between the Vitagraph Company and himself.

The cause of the dissolution is merely the latter's lesire "to go it alone." For a matter of ten years or so the name of "Ince" and "Vitagraph" have been closely connected. The retiring producer-director has been with the Flatbush organization practically that length of time, half of which he has spent in the supervision of productions and the development of performers.

Mr. Ince is still a young man. Both of his parents were stage folk and he himself has done some noteworthy character studies, among them one of Abraham Lincoln (before the camera) which was particularly well received. He also served a stage apprenticeship in the company of the late Richard Mansfield, and was also in the original productions of "Ben Hur" and the "College Widow."

He provided the first three and the first five-reel pictures put out by the Vitagraph Company. Ralph is recognized universally as one of the foremost producers of the day and his new undertaking will give him wide scope to turn out unexcelled features.

In starring Lucille Lee Stewart and Huntly Gordon, Mr. Ince has wisely chosen a combination that he believes will eventually have no counterpart among the many leading performers. Mr. Ince announces that he has several big surprises in store for the lovers of the silent drama, some of which will shortly make their appearance.

Jeanne Eagels in New Pathe

It is not often that faith healing is the theme of a motion picture feature. In "The World and the Woman," the Pathe Gold Rooster play for November 19, Thanhouser has taken such a theme and with it evolved a remarkable picture. Through faith a girl of the streets finds the soul within her awakening and through it becomes spiritually reborn. Miss Jeanne Eagels makes her Thanhouser debut in this picture and her work is of a kind that leads us to hope that she will appear in other features. Miss Eagels is a Kansas City girl. After some experience she went to New York and secured an important part with Billie Burke in "Mind the Paint." She later played opposite Julian Eltinge in "The Crinoline Girl." Then she followed Elsie Ferguson in the leading role in "Outcast" on tour. She was then engaged as a member of the all star cast in "The Great Pursuit."

Rothacker Prints Children's Film

The Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company has just completed for the Fort Dearborn Photoplays Company the printing of its five-reel production "Modern Mother Goose," which is to be released in Chicago. The play has some beautiful settings and is enacted almost entirely by children. Except in the introduction only one of the child players is over thirteen years of age. The principal parts in the production were taken by Marjorie Beardsley, former Universal leading lady now under contract with the Fort Dearborn Photoplay Company, Myrtle von Betz and Ellis Paul.

All of the photography in this picture was done by Wesley Smith and Edwin Linden, both of the Rothacker Film Manufacturing Company and the same Chicago organization handled all of the laboratory work.

Juanita Jumps Again

Juanita Hansen is now with the Triangle-Mack Sennett-Keystone studios.

Miss Hansen signed her contract Friday, the thirteenth of October, and declares that unlucky days and dates mean nothing in her life.

Juanita Hansen, the swirlly moving meteor who is now with Triangle-Keystone.

The pretty golden haired, blue eyed Juanita received her first comedy experience under the direction of Mack Sennett and has been engaged to appear in a series of light comedies.

She has resided in Los Angeles most of her life and entered the moving picture field about two years ago. Her last picture before coming to the Keystone studios was "The Secret of the Submarine," the American serial in which she played the leading role.

Miss Hansen will head a company directed by Harry Williams, the well known song writer, who received his initial experience in the scenario department of the Keystone plant. Of late Mr. Williams has been co-directing with William Campbell in the company headed by Chester Conklin.

Miss Hansen has had a most interesting and successful career in moving pictures and will be a decided attraction in future Triangle-Keystone comedies.

Two Pathe Gold Rooster Plays

"Shadows and Sunshine," "Hidden Valley." Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

IN "Shadows and Sunshine" little Marie Osborne not only carries well the burden put upon her by the scenario but she has something in reserve at all times. Marie is without a doubt a ray of sunshine and therefore she is all the story this picture tells would have her.

Marie is a star who has not been taught to act and she does not act; it's just a case of being magnetic of personality and perfectly natural even if the camera is looking on. She is surrounded by a cast of such well known Balboa players as Daniel Gilfether, Lucy Payton and Mollie McConnell and still she is the star of the picture, not only as a result of being made the center of the interest by the story but through her own ability to be perfectly natural.

Marie Osborne has a smile and a breezy manner that remind one of Douglas Fairbanks. Her smile is as pronounced and infectious as any that have graced the screen. The little girl whom Marie makes so convincing and interesting is directly responsible for reuniting a lonely old couple with their son, whom they drove from their home and hearts when he married. The Jackson home is filled with shadows until Little Mary enters, and then comes happiness. There are many good bits of comedy and "Shadows and Sunshine" is amusing all the time. It is a five-reel Gold Rooster play whose marked ability to entertain wholesomely will make it popular with every audience.

"HIDDEN VALLEY"

This Thanhouser production tells a story which, we are informed, resembles in general the romances written by Ryder Haggard, but as far as that goes it may also be said to have the style of a George Barr McCutcheon novel. The play tells of a divinity student's visit to the valley inhabited by an African tribe. Hidden Valley is far removed from civilization. He goes there on a matter of business—seeking ostrich plumes to be exact.

The valley has for years been short of water and the natives are continually making sacrifices to the water god. The student arrives on the scene in time to shoot a native who is about to stab one of the nobles in the back. He is hailed as a white god and very much surprised to see a white woman living with the tribe. He at the first opportunity learns her story. She is the daughter of an explorer and through an accident was carried to this remote place by a swift current which runs beneath the house in which she is held captive. She is to be sacrificed to the water god also. But the student investigates the stream of water flowing beneath the hut and finds that only a blast of powder is needed to give Hidden Valley all the water required. The blast is executed and the student with the white girl leaves the valley amid the cheers of the awed natives.

Valkyrien (the Baroness De Witz) is featured and she is a feature of the offering, her beauty being advantageously set off by the classic white crepe garment she gracefully wears draped about her. Valkyrien dances attractively and she fits into the picture well.

The African station is rather convincingly portrayed. The scenes include many blacks, presumably of Florida residence, who look very well as uncivilized sons of Africa's wilds. The supporting cast includes Boyd Marshall, Ernest Warde and Arthur Bower.

"Small Town Stuff"

Three-Reel Selig Drama Released October 30. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS is one of the "Bloom Center" comedies written by Maibelle Heikes Justice. It is on the order of the previous plays of the series, generally familiar to exhibitors. Norval MacGregor is the director. The comedy, which contains slapstick methods, is laid in a traditional small town and the characters are the (stage) small town types. With this material, the producers have worked out a great deal of exaggerated but effective comedy. It will go very well in comedy loving audiences. The action is swift and spirited. It is, as a whole, a very acceptable offering.

The Story: Among the citizens of Bloom Center are Constable Plum, correspondence school detective on the trail of an escaped crook, Micky the Mick; Johnny West, would-be journalist, and Percy, from the city, both in love with Margaret Tate, editress of the Bloom Center Bugle. Othello Booth, an actor, arrives in the village and stages a play, using the talent which the sewing circle provides. Othello falls in love with the editress and arouses the jealousy of her other suitors, who plan his downfall. They break up the play and create much disturbance throughout the town. At last chance reveals the true identity of the supposed actor, who is really Micky the Mick. The constable claims the reward, and life goes on as usual in Bloom Center.

"The Soul of Kura-San"

Sessue Hayakawa in Lasky-Paramount Offering. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE SOUL OF KURA-SAN" is an excellent vehicle for Sessue Hayakawa. But the real purpose of this story by Charles Sarver does not stop at opportunities to the featured actor, for it also presented the producer with occasions to affect forceful drama and great pictorial beauty. "The Soul of Kura-San" is a drama turning about a Japanese artist's determination for revenge upon the American who betrayed and caused Kura-San to take her own life. There is continuous interest here. Also there is real punch.

Though most of its action takes place in the Flowery Kingdom and there is equal use of interior and exterior settings, here is a picture which, produced in California, fairly breathes out the atmosphere of Old Nippon. In vain did the several reviewers present at the trade showing in New York last Friday look for some alien touch, a touch of the West in this patch of the East holding the screen. True there was a discordant note at the showing, but that was supplied by the censors who were among those present. These censors were in good form, they censored some of the reviewer boys for smoking.

"His name—quick!"

The story of "The Soul of Kura-San" is not unfamiliar. The picture opens in Japan and shows the true love which binds Kura-San and the impecunious Toyo, an artsit. The father of Kura-San forbids this match, he wishes his daughter to marry a wealthy merchant. Toyo comes to America to enter business with his prosperous uncle. His letters to Kura-San are intercepted by her father and one of them is substituted for a note supposedly written by Toyo and telling Kura-San that he has married his rich cousin.

After the death of his uncle Toyo returns to Japan. But Kura-San is to know only sorrow through his return. Kura-San has been betrayed by an American artist named Herbert Graham. She commits suicide and in her dying condition tells Toyo that the man was an American named Herbert Gray. Toyo hurries to America on learning that the betrayer has left Japan. Through the painting Kura-San posed for, Toyo locates the artist and on finding that his name is Graham is filled with hatred toward the memory of Kura-San, whom he protests lied to him to save her lover.

At first Toyo is bent upon killing Graham, but then he determines that his revenge must be truer to its term than that. His opportunity comes when Graham marries a beautiful girl. Toyo after planning carefully arranges the moment when he will be revenged. But the outcome is not what he expected, for his attack upon the American girl is interrupted by Graham and then the girl's conduct awakens him to the fact that as she lied to save her lover from harm, so too did Kura-San lie to save him, Toyo, from the guilt of murder.

The dramatic situations are presented with great conviction and force, while the pictorial and love scenes laid in Japan have distinct charm. The direction and production of the picture are of a very high quality. The photography is of course excellent. Director Le Saint is to be complimented on many points, not the least of them being the force put into the scenes of Kura-San's death from a self-inflicted wound. In this there is drama without its horribleness.

Myrtle Stedman appears in the role of Anne Willoughby and she pleases. Tsuru Aoki is splendid as Kura-San. George Webb is the American artist. A number of Japanese actors and actresses of ability appear in the picture.

"The Hidden Scar"

Ethel Clayton and Holbrook Blinn in World Drama. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS five reel picture, directed by Barry O'Neil at the Peerless studio for the World program, deals with a woman who has transgressed the moral law and who reforms to find later that her past threatens to destroy her present happiness. The theme is of course very old, but when interpreted by so capable a cast as this, it makes a living and interesting play. Ethel Clayton as Janet Hall, the woman, has an unusually sympathetic role. Holbrook Blinn has a small but important role of a physical culture teacher whose belief it is that Christians do not really live up to their own doctrines. The introduction of this character and his ideas is important in that the subject is presented from this point of view.

Montague Love has a short but very well acted role, that of Henry Dalton, whose mistress Janet has been. Madge Evans the child player, has an important part and has been effectively used by the director to win sympathy. Irving Cummings plays Dale Overton, the young minister, while Edward Kimball and Mrs. Woodward play his father and mother. The settings and photography are good, the acting excellent.

As a whole, the play is an appealing one, well presented. It should prove a good attraction for any house. The appeal is to the emotions rather than to the logical sense, which, with most audiences is something in its favor. The majority of patrons would rather feel than think, and while a few may question Janet's sense of fair play, the many will only sympathize with her sorrows.

The Story: Janet Hall is a cabaret singer, weary of the so-called gay life. She is the mother of a little grl who is cared for in a home. Henry Dalton, who is the father of the child, dies, leaving Janet an income and a home in a small town. Janet and her little girl go to the village to live. There Janet meets a young minister and later marries him without telling him of her past life or that the little girl is an illegitimate child.

While at college, Dale had formed a friendship with a physical culture teacher who refused to be converted to the young minister's creed because, as he saw things, the Christian idea of forgiveness was not really enforced. This man, Doane, visits the newly married couple and recognizes in the woman the former cabaret singer. He keeps her secret, but later chance reveals to her husband her former relations with Dalton. Dale and his parents turn against Janet until Doane sneeringly points out the discrepancy between Dale's preaching and action. Then Dale decides to do as he bade others do, and he forgives Janet.

"The Heart of Virginia Keep"

Three-Reel Essanay Drama Released November 4. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS offering somehow gives the impression that the scenes were taken without much reference to the plot of the story. Many of the incidents shown have little apparent bearing on the story, while important points remain entirely obscure. We are of the opinion that in assembling the film to make three reels, the producers kept those which showed to best advantage the two leading players, letting the story die.

As presented, the offering depends entirely upon Marguerite Clayton and Edward Arnold to "put it across." These two players are in many respects so typical of the conventional screen favorites that the picture may have an appeal for this reason. Miss Clayton does not forget any of the tricks of the ingenue, and Mr. Arnold has a role in which he can appear quite hero-like. Although both players fail to show originality or personality in characterizations, they will satisfy a tolerant audience.

Before the trouble began.

In photography only is the release equal to the best Essanay productions. Throughout almost the entire picture, the photography is beyond criticism.

The Story: Virginia Keep and a young district attorney have just announced to Virginia's father the fact of their engagement, when the story opens. That evening, the father receives a mysterious message which causes him to leave home without revealing his destination. Then the family learns that he is wanted for the murder of two men, which occurred twenty-five years ago. His wife at once sues for divorce but his daughter remains true to him and breaks her engagement to the district attorney, who is prosecuting the case.

At this time, Arnold Dempster Trude, millionaire owner of the leading newspaper, arrives in the city and takes a position on his own paper as reporter. Only the managing editor is aware of his identity. He interviews Virginia and is so attracted by the girl that he sets out to aid her father. However, Keep is captured, convicted and sent to prison.

Virginia is given a position on the paper at an unusual salary, through the influence of Trude. Later she learns his true identity. He declares his love for her, but Virginia refuses to marry him.

Virginia receives a mysterious message calling her to a mysterious address in the slums. Disguised as a messenger and armed with a revolver, the girls keeps the appointment. She has an exciting time, a battle with crooks, etc., and is wounded. She learns that her father's brother was the real murderer, but before she can use her information the governor has pardoned her father. Her duty to her father compl ted, she marries Trude.

"Love and Hate"

Six-Reel William Fox Production Features Bertha Kalich. Reviewed by George W. Graves

IN "Love and Hate" Bertha Kalich is provided with a role which is highly emotional and in which she has many scenes of unquestionable merit. Her characterization easily constitutes the sympathetic center of the picture. She is cast as a young wife who becomes the victim of two crafty designers, one who covets and is bound to get her at any cost and the other who, a former sweetheart of her husband's, resolves to once more secure him for herself. Of course, the situation hinges to a great extent upon the "trusting" husband's willingness to suspect his wife of an unbelievable wrong after he has lived with her long enough to know what kind of stuff she is made of, but this is a common happening in pictures, sometimes more and sometimes less true to life.

The story goes on to tell how the husband, craftily tricked by the evil-purposed couple, sues for and procures a divorce from his wife. Realizing that the only thing the wife will endanger herself for is her child, the villain steals and holds the latter in his clutches, agreeing to let it go only after the woman has acceded to his wishes. In desperation the unfortunate woman kills her persecutor, the evidence in the case pointing to suicide. When the husband hears from her lips that she killed the villain he seems again inclined to trust ner word after all his stolidity and takes her in his arms.

Stuart Holmes is, as ever, a capital villain. For a large part of the film he is required to make up with a blinded eye (from a blow dealt him by the infuriated husband) which makes him look formidable indeed. Kenneth Hunter is a good type for the husband, and Madeleine Le Nard as the stone-hearted villainess, achieves one of her best performances. Little Jane and Katherine Lee are "alive and kicking," to the great enhancement of the picture's lighter moments.

The forceful emotional part played by Bertha Kalich, the splendid supporting cast, and the many tense moments of the story, make this a Fox offering which is saturated with feeling, and which will please, if not entirely convince those who pay to see it. Mary Murillo wrote the story and James Vincent expressed much wisdom in directing.

"The Scarlet Oath"

Gail Kane Has Dual Role in World Production. Reviewed by Genevieve Harris

THIS drama reminds one strongly of the exciting adventure tales he read in secret in school days, regarding nihilists, Russian prisons, daggers, secret signals, hair breadth escapes and all the rest of the thrill producing apparatus. Its appeal is to an uncritical, adventure loving audience, who will doubtless enjoy it, even though they have seen others of similar outline.

The title refers to the oath of vengeance sworn by a beautiful girl of a nihilist group against the cruel Russian official who caused her mother's death. Gail Kane plays a dual role in the story, acting as the nihilist, Olga and her twin sister, Nina, adopted and educated by Americans of wealth. She differentiates between the girls well. The nihilist, Olga, is the more important, Nina appearing only in a few scenes and being wholly conventional. In Olga, Miss Kane gives a strong characterization which is marred by the fact that the plot makes her do a number of improbable things.

On the whole, the offering is not up to the standard of recent releases on the World program. It would be easy to point out many incidents that tax belief, perhaps the main one being the escape of Olga in company with her sister's fiance when for several weeks she poses as Nina and the man Nina is to marry never suspects that she is a stranger. The ending of the play is rather unsatisfactory also, since Olga is the only one in the story who wins sympathy, and one would prefer a successful outcome to her thrilling journey.

On the other hand, the play does hold the attention and its melodramatic situations stir horror and sympathy. It will entertain audiences in the middle class houses.

The acting of Miss Kane is superior to the rest of the cast. The other players are Philip Hahn as the father of the girls, Montagu Love as the Russian official, Carleton Macey, Allan Hale and Lillian Paige. Frank Powers and Travers Vale directed the play from an original story by Frederic Kulz, scenariozed by Gardner Hunting.

The Story: Nina and Olga Pavloff are twin sisters. After the death of their mother, caused by the persecution of the police, their father leaves Russia, taking them to America. There Nina is adopted by a wealthy family and grows up a society girl, while Olga, who remains with her father, becomes a nihilist.

At the time when Nina's engagement is announced to a young diplomat, Olga and her father are ready to fulfill their oath of vengeance against the Russian police. And when Nina and her foster mother sail on a pleasure trip to Europe, Olga and her father go on a more sinister mission. Later Nina's fiance is appointed to a diplomatic post in Russia. Olga and her father are captured by the police and the father is tortured until he dies, but Olga is able to save herself and to kill the chief of police, thus fulfilling "the scarlet oath." She makes her escape to America under the protection of Nina's fiance by posing as her sister. In America she goes to her sister's home to avert suspicion. The real Nina had also returned to America and the sisters meet. But Olga had been followed by the secret agents of Russia and is shot by one of them.

"The Sex Lure"

A Six-Reel Ivan Society Drama Released in November. Reviewed by George W. Graves

IT seems rather unwise on the part of the producer to call this picture "The Sex Lure," for the name suggests an offensiveness that is not to be found in the film, and we know of many people who would be prejudiced at the outset by this title.

The story has much good material in it, in fact, quite enough to make six entertaining reels, and its developments are tinged with originality, if the main theme is not. Mr. Abramson's direction generally is effective, though in some minor cases it does not convince. He made his scenario from a story by Don Dundas. In dramatic, entertaining, and artistic value this is the best picture Mr. Abramson has yet produced. Very beautiful backgrounds were used in the picture's making, as well as good interiors, and all of this quite transcends Ivan's previous artistic showings.

The story depicts the manner in which a husband and wife drift apart, the wife's unreasoning, prolonged melancholy at the supposed death of her son, and the advances of a young girl who thinks she has a reason for stealing away the husband's love and wrecking his home, being at the bottom of the estrangement. Finally the son, who has been reported dead, but who in reality has been alive, minus his memory, is restored to his mother and his memory returns at the sight of her. The son then goes to his father and manages to break the spell between him and the designing girl by feigning a love scene, which the father witnesses. The girl's denunciation of the old man, revealing her true motive, completes the father's cure. Then the young man repudiates the girl, brings his father to his mother, and there is a happy reconciliation.

Donald Hall is to be lauded for his good acting as the husband and Frankie Mann shares equal honors with him as the husband's enticer. In our mind this is Miss Mann's best screen portrayal. Of Louise Vale is required no little amount of emotional acting. Others in the picture are James Morrison, Marie Reichardt, W. W. Black, and George Henry.

"The Criminal"

A Five-Part Triangle-Kay Bee Drama Released in November. Reviewed by George W. Graves

AS the unfortunate Italian girl in this picture, Clara Williams has played one of the best roles of her career. Supremely suited to the part of Naneta, she interprets it with remarkable dramatic force. C. Gardner Sullivan wrote the story. Naneta is a poor Italian girl who suffers the terrible ostracism of society because of the fact that she is fatherless. Finally the girl comes to America to work for a mean-souled restaurant proprietor on the East Side of New York. She finds a deserted baby and decides to keep the child in order to protect it from the maltreatment she has suffered. Although she uses care to keep the child hidden, detectives finally learn that she has it in her possession and accuse her of kidnapping.

Rather than have the baby's illegitimate parentage discovered she admits the accusation. But White, a young author, and frequenter of the restaurant, who has fallen in love with Naneta, works with the authorities, who trick her into telling the truth about the baby. The story closes with the marriage of the Italian girl and the novelist, who agrees to adopt the "bambina."

William Desmond as Donald White, the girl's lover, carries his part well, although it offers no such opportunities as that of Clara Williams. Joseph J. Dowling is nothing short of excellent in a character role—that of the old restaurant keeper. Gertrude Claire, Charles K. French and Walt Whitman are also in the cast. The director, Reginald Barker, has handled his picture capably and convincingly, although for many the action will be too slow. Attention has been closely paid to detail in all of the scenes, and we never fail to have the correct atmosphere. "The Criminal" is a picture which will be thoroughly enjoyed by the majority of people.

"Beatrice Fairfax"

Eleventh Episode of International's Series. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy.

"OPEN the safe and drop its contents into the ocean. Do not touch the third button. The machine is loaded with poison gas." This fear-inspiring and somewhat interesting message is left among the papers of an inventor to his daughter and it makes up the basis for the action of the eleventh episode of the "Beatrice Fairfax" series. Needless to say, there is much very melo melodrama in this release. It could not be otherwise with a start like that.

"The Wages of Sin," is the title of the episode. Jane Hamlin is the girl whose father dies before he can dispose of the infernal machine he invented. She is about to comply with his written request when her fiance enters upon the scene. While Jane and Boyd are seated in the drawing room a man enters stealthily. Boyd secures his revolver and holds him while Jane goes to telephone for the police. The crook offers Boyd a thousand dollars if he will help him get the "only perfect infernal machine in existence."

The young man takes the bribe and allows the crook to escape. That night the spirit of Jane's dead father appears and commands her to give his invention to the man she loves. The poor girl is alone in the world and she writes to Beatrice Fairfax for advice. With Beatrice comes Jimmy Barton and a solution of the mystery. Boyd impersonates the ghost, it is proven to Jane, and the crook gets the infernal machine but it goes off in his den and kills a lot of vicious bomb-throwers.

Harry Fox, Grace Darling, Betty Howe and Nigel Barrie make up the cast.

"American Aristocracy"

Five-Part Triangle-Fine Arts Comedy Released Nov. 12. Reviewed by George W. Graves

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS' comedy is of the lasting kind. It is as delightfully refined and withal as exceedingly mirth provoking as it is human. This picture ranks among the very best of the Fairbanks offerings yet to appear, in acting, story and production. The story, by Anita Loos, which places Fairbanks in the role of a zealous entomologist (which is, interpreted, bug-hunter) who abandons this avocation long enough to prevent the successful working of a filibustering plot, and to win the girl, contains situation after situation of sparkling humor, as well as some dramatic developments. Some of the acrobatic stunts which Mr. Fairbanks performs will surprise even those who are familiar with his monkey-like agility in this line.

Opposite Mr. Fairbanks is the fascinating and youthful Jewel Carmen, whose acting never fails to register effectively. Another part played with much pleasure for the audience is that of Charles de Lima as the manufacturer of the famous "one hump hat pin." Albert Parker is always good as the heavy. The subtitles, which are so necessary to the full appreciation of the picture's comedy, were written with exceptional cleverness and serve to bring forth many expansive smiles.

Lloyd Ingraham's direction has its large part in the picture's success. An aeroplane, speed-boat and a U. S. cruiser are some of the things which put "pep" into the action. The photography and selection of suitable sets could scarcely be improved upon, and there is nothing in any way objectionable in the picture. From the point of pleasing his patrons, and filling his house, the exhibitor does not have an over-abundance of such attractions as "American Aristocracy."

"The Honorable Algy"

Triangle-Ince Offering Has Quality. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

dignified estate of his father, the Marquis of Monteith. On the trip here Algy meets a Miss Grace Dryker, whose father is fabulously wealthy, and by a slip in the plans of a crook he gets possession of a precious diamond stolen from Dryker.

Algy is tempted to keep the jewel and go back home, because there is a pretty girl waiting for him over there, but he at last determines to return it to Dryker. It happens that the box containing the jewel is mistaken by a fortune-seeking Lord Rockmore for a package of love letters being sent to Grace by a music hall singer he has cast aside. The result is a complete showing-up of Lord Rockmore and Algy wins a fortune through an investment arranged by Grace with her choice of a husband, an alert broker. At a Christmas party given by the Drykers Algy is astounded by meeting there his own Patricia, who has been brought to this country by Grace as a surprise for his Christmas.

The scenario by J. G. Hawks is admirable indeed. The construction is expert and the plot developed with great smoothness and effect. "The Honorable Algy" is a faultlessly told story. It is particularly fine in the first four reels. The ending is perhaps a bit too sweet. It is pleasant but not strong like the beginning and middle of this remarkably interesting romance.

Margery Wilson is Patricia; a not large part but one whose existence one can rejoice in since Miss Wilson portrays it. Margaret Thompson as Grace Dryker, Charles French, Howard Hickman and Walt Whitman distinguish themselves in important roles. The balance of the cast is made up of Albert Cody, Jerome Storm, Louise Brownell, Thomas Guise and Katherine Kirkwood.

The director, Raymond B. West, treated the material with remarkably effective skill. The settings in England, on shipboard and in New York are quite all that they should be and enough in excess of this to make them quite a matter of keen pleasure. In the direction of the action Mr. West also procured the maximum of effect. "The Honorable Algy" moves along at a good pace and it carries the spectator with it. The picture can be highly recommended.

"The Microscope Mystery"

Triangle-Fine Arts Comedy Drama Featuring Wilfred Lucas. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

SOMETHING a bit novel in crime detection is shown in "The Microscope Mystery," a Fine Arts production in which Wilfred Lucas and Constance Talmadge appear. The closing scenes of the picture find the heroine charged with a murder and the town doctor becomes a factor in the inquest when he states that the revolver was handled by a tuberculosis sufferer who has a habit of coughing into his hand. Then both the characters and the spectators learn who killed the quack doctor who has come to the town to make a clean-up.

"The Microscope Mystery" is an original scenario by W. W. Wing produced under the direction of Paul Powell. In the past both the author and the producer of this picture have done superior work in their respective callings. The play lacks incident and on this account it is often slow in its progress to a situation which contains the element of mystery but for some reason or other fails to surprise when it is explained. The most interesting thing about the picture is the character of the doctor which Mr. Lucas plays so effectively. And the best thing about the doctor, from the spectator's standpoint, is when he plays baseball with a lot of young boys while his patients sit in his office and wait for him to keep his appointment with them.

Doctor Arnold spends as much or more time studying bugs and microbes as he does on his patients. He is of the modern school and informs many of those ailing ones who come to his office that they are well and need no medicine. The town has its share of neurasthenics and a quack doctor who opens impressive offices soon has all the customers he can take care of. Arnold laughs at the "Dr. Bell" establishment with its staff of European specialists.

Wilfred Lucas in "The Microscope Mystery."

Ira Dayton, a rich farmer, is an easy victim for Bell and while his daughter Jessie, in whom Arnold is greatly interested, is away, Bell completely wins the confidence of Dayton. Bell also gets a check for ten thousand dollars but before he gets out of the house Jessie comes home and demands that he return the check to her. Here the shooting occurs and shortly after it the solution and the marriage of Arnold and Jessie.

There are any number of microscopic pictures of bacilli and butterflies and moths introduced here and there throughout the film. These of course have little to do with the story, except that they make it last longer. The settings are good and there is a rather good cast in support of Miss Talmadge and Mr. Lucas.

"The Heir to the Hoorah"

Lasky-Paramount Production of Paul Armstrong Play. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

THE picturegoer who is in search of an hour's good entertainment will make no more mistake in visiting the theater showing Lasky's picturization of "The Heir to the Hoorah" than did that producing organization in selecting this comedy by Paul Armstrong for motion picture presentation. "The Heir to the Hoorah" is certainly a good screen comedy. It provokes laughter and after the first half has passed it never does stop entertaining. The play is good and the production and acting is even better than the play.

The homecoming.

Thomas Meighan and Anita King head one of the most uniformly effective casts ever presented by the Lasky company. Mr. Meighan and Miss King are excellent and so are all the other players who appear in the picture. Edythe Chapman, Horace B. Carpenter, Charles Ogle, Ernest Joy and Joane Woodbury are included in the cast. Carpenter and Ogle as Bud and Bill respectively fit into the picture splendidly.

"The Heir to the Hoorah" is laid in California. The three bachelor owners of the rich Hoorah mine lament the lack of an heir to leave all their wealth to and in the dice-rolling contest to decide which of the three shall marry, the youngest either loses or wins or does both—at any rate Joe is to marry. It is some time before he chooses a wife and when he does it happens to be a girl whose mother encourages the match because Joe has lots of money. But Joe and Geraldine are really in love and were it not for the mother their home would never have known the trouble which comes when Mrs. Kent desires to maintain an establishment of "refinement and culture" as it were.

Bud and Bill are not welcome in the home. They attend one affair but Bill tells a story that is considerably off color, judging by the results, which is that Bud and Bill are ordered out of the house. Then Joe learns that Geraldine married him for his money and he leaves. But finally there is a reunion and an heir to the Hoorah.

The scenario was written by Beatrice de Mille and Leighton Osmun. Barring the introductory scenes, which jump from place to place a bit jerkily, the adaptation is most praiseworthy. The production was most ably directed. No opportunity to affect some pleasing touch from the picturesque characters provided by the story was overlooked. The photography is of the best Lasky brand and therefore a real delight.

strenuous endeavor to tell a story and show the latest fashions at the same time. In the first episode the producers make it evident that they are willing to pay out money to get thrills in their pictures.

"The Adventures of Dorothy Dare" is the title of the series. The first episode is entitled "It's Never Too Late." The story is about a cloak model who in her innocence goes out to dinner with a man whose deeds have earned him the dislike of good people. Dorothy Dare and the girl's impecunious sweetheart rescue her; they hurry to the cafe place in an automobile and when that breaks down both get into the cabin of a locomotive and Dick drives it at a high rate of speed and they arrive in time to save the girl from the toils of the villain.

The gowns shown are described in sub-titles. Personally we were not much taken with any of the gowns, but this is perhaps the highest compliment the creations could possibly receive. The fashion portion of the pictures must, of course, be the main attraction, and doubtless it will. It is probable that the latest thing in women's clothes will even go so far as to keep picture-goers interested in the stories depicted in "The Adventures of Dorothy Dare" series.

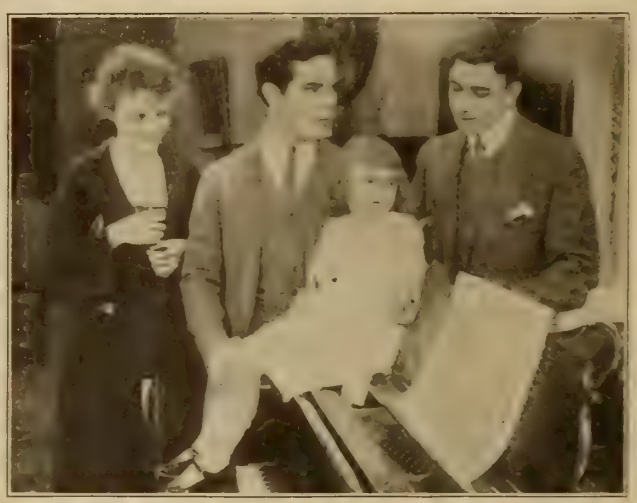
"Beatrice Fairfax"

Twelfth Episode of the International Series. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

A VERY secretive secret service agent's peculiar actions so arouse his wife's suspicions that she, in her trying suspense between the two questions "is my husband a crook or is he what he represents himself to me?" seeks both enlightenment and comfort from Beatrice Fairfax and incidentally makes the groundwork for two reels of swift melodramatic action. The foregoing applies to the twelfth episode of the International series "Beatrice Fairfax."

A more detailed synopsis would tell one that Henry Hanson stays up late one night and receives a visit from a rough looking individual. His wife overhears Hanson say "I did two years in Atlanta prison, you needn't fear me." Then follows the letter to Beatrice and later still Beatrice and Jimmy Barton lend their aid to Mrs. Hanson.

Both Beatrice and the distressed wife are captured by the band of crooks Mr. Hanson now consorts with. They are about to be trapped in a cellar and the house burned over them when Jimmy, who in the disguise of a woman, has entered the stronghold of the crooks, puts up a fight and he is joined by Hanson. The general cause of the crooks is further ruined by the entrance of a number of secret service agents. After the fight Mrs. Hanson learns that her husband is a secret service man and that he has run down the gang which has a habit of putting bombs in places where they do great harm.



As usual Harry Fox and Grace Darling head the cast. Nigel Barrie and Evelyn Fariss appear in this episode. The players do remarkably well and there is compensation for the absence of Betty Howe, whose appearances in many of the episodes added much to the pleasure afforded by these two-reel melodramas.

"The Devils Prize"

Vitagraph Drama Released by V. L. S. E. November 6. Reviewed by Thomas C. Kennedy

"THE DEVIL'S PRIZE" was written and produced by Marguerite Bertsch and will be released on the Vitagraph-V. L. S. E. program on November 6. It is a drama of rather somber tone throughout, there being few moments during the progress of the action which could even be called light. If drama thus sustained through the entire five reels has the required force and its characters carry sufficient sympathy there is naturally no reason for desiring an occasional let-down in the stern tone of melodramatic action. "The Devil's Prize" is heavy; its scenes are long in most cases and while the play is replete with important incidents it does rather tax one to keep the story in line.

Six characters are concerned in the play, and at some time during the action all six come under the evil wrought by St. Clair. The latter marries a wealthy girl and he poses as a champion of the laboring class. The story is laid in a mining district in Pennsylvania. St. Clair has betrayed Myra Roland and she, to avoid shame married Hugh Roland, the editor of a newspaper. This fact is known to the mine owner, Stratton, and he holds this knowledge to force St. Claire to sell small blocks of stock in the now worked-out mine to the working people.

St. Claire tries to keep his own name clear by making Hugh Roland the leading figure in this sale of worthless stock. The reckoning comes. Hugh is denounced by the miners and his enmity reaches the breaking point when he learns that Emmy is not his daughter but St. Claire's. The latter dies before Hugh can do any violence. There is another development, quite useless as far as the story is concerned, for St. Claire murders Stratton and tries to place the blame on John Baldwin, who is still in love with Adeline St. Claire. In this he is not successful.

The players all do remarkably well with their opportunities Antonio Moreno, Naomi Childers, Clio Ayers, Templar Saxe, Albert S. Howson and Lark Taylor make up the cast. Mildred Platz, the little girl whose presence is a distinct advantage to the play, is also a clever actress. The settings and photography are particularly good. The director, or directoress should it be, secured many very beautiful exterior settings. There is an abundant use made of the cut-back and in all cases save those which show important incidents occurring previous to the opening of the play these cut-backs are unnecessary and therefor have the effect of padding. "The Devil's Prize" is an admirably acted and produced picture unfolding a plot that is as heavy as those employed in the most dramatic of the German operas.

Moss to Produce "One Hour"

The B. S. Moss Motion Picture Corporation's pioneer effort was a picturization of Elinor Glyn's novel "Three Weeks." The second of this series of love romances, "One Day," was also produced by the Moss Company, and now is to come the third and concluding volume of this trilogy in the filming of "One Hour."

Mr. Moss is negotiating at the present time with several noted stars of both the legitimate and screen worlds to enact the various principal roles called for by the scenario. One of the most prominent directors will be engaged to stage the production which, when completed will, as the sixth release on the Moss one-a-month, round out the first half year of Mr. Moss' new policy.

"Atmosphere"

Perhaps the motion picture industry has not produced any printed matter which has better succeeded in encouraging an artistic and high class atmosphere for the presentation of pictures than the little booklet, "How to Handle Motion Pictures," which is now being distributed to exhibitors throughout the United States with the compliments of the Artcraft Pictures Corporation.

The brochure was written by Wells Hawks and the author is certainly to be congratulated upon his work.

The industry is in need of just this sort of elevating forces to bring the production and presentation of pictures up to the plane to which they rightfully belong. The booklet creates a desire on the part of the exhibitor for the finest sort of "atmosphere" for his house and the houses that attain this will tap a source of elite business which hitherto has been more or less neglected, except by the larger houses.

As the foreword says: "Mr. Hawks is not attempting to tell the exhibitor how to run his theater. He is simply making suggestions that should prove of definite help; and the whole trend of these suggestions is toward a better presentation of pictures in general, and the new Mary Pickford pictures in particular.

Edna May Suffers Operation

Mrs. Oscar Lewisohn, known to stage and motion picture patrons as Edna May, has been operated on for appendicitis. She is making a rapid recovery.

Perhaps the crowning incident of a brilliant career was Edna May's magnificent contribution to the Red Cross charities, made possible by the payment to her of $100,000 for a few weeks' work in the Vitagraph V.-L.-S.-E. production, "Salvation Joan."

To Produce Classics Only

Idealism and practicability are a possible combination in the opinion of the men who have organized the Classic Film Corporation. It is incorporated for $200,000 under the laws of the State of New York, and has offices at 507 Fifth avenue. The president of the new organization is J. Alan Turner, who stands alone at the top of the technical directors in the film industry. The vice-president is Lieut. Viktor DeLinsky, whose seven wounds in the Russo-Japanese war won him several decorations for distinguished bravery and an honorable discharge from the Russian cavalry service. He then became an actor. The director-in-chief is Arthur Donaldson, with Richard Sterling as co-director. Philip Mindil will be the publicity and advertising manager.

The object of the Classic Film is to produce in a highly artistic way for the screen the standard literature of the world, and it will begin with a series of twenty episodes from the Arabian Nights, following with the celebrated fairy tales and mythological stories of the world. The company is now forming and is being very carefully selected. It will sail for Jamaica, British West Indies, on November 2.

"The Wealth Lure" Ready

The Latin American Producing Company of 1482 Broadway, New York, reports that its first production, "The Wealth Lure," a five-reel modern society drama with Vera Sisson and Sidney Mason in the leading roles, is completed.

The picture was filmed at Grantwood, N. J., and some striking scenes were taken in Central Park. A large quota of mounted policemen figured in an exciting runaway scene on the bridal path.

The Latin American Producing Company has contracted with C. Lang Cobb, Jr., to market the company productions. Mr. Cobb will handle the sales department from his offices in the Columbia Theater building.

New Unicorns

The newly elected president of the Unicorn Film Service Corporation, Ike Schlank, announced to a representative of Motography last week that he has had the good fortune to discover a good comedian who is entirely different in rank and file from the screen funmakers. The personage in question is Billy West, who has been well-known to audiences everywhere for his extremely funny work. Important among Unicorn's announcements is a three-reel drama, "The Path of Darkness," which was produced by the Norbig Film Company. Another of the novelties on the Unicorn program is the new two-reel society drama, "When Hands Are Idle."

Ivan Special Features

For the past half year Ivan Abramson has devoted every spare moment of his time to the development of what he says is the master effort of his career. Taking a theme the subject of which treats of the follies of ignorance and the results sustained by the fact that sufficient enlightenment is not furnished the young by their parents, the result of six months' work of this dramatist should, when filmed, rank as one of the most sensational and powerful screen dramas of the year and one which points out so powerful a moral lesson that it is destined to create comment and controversy wherever exhibited.

There are eight principal acting roles in the new play, each one of which is as important as the next, and each giving the artist chosen to play the part ample opportunity to display artistry and character delineation in its portrayal.

An exceptional cast is being assembled of artists of both the legitimate and the silent stage, each one a star, it being the purpose of the producer to film a drama with the most distinctive all-star cast of the year.

As is the Ivan custom, no expense will be spared to make this a most lavish production, which will be staged by Mr. Abramson.

Contrary to the usual custom, this play will not be released as a regular Ivan feature, but will be exploited as a special feature employing all methods of publicity to create both exhibitor and audience demand. Its length will be a minimum of seven reels.

Powerful Moss Play

Opinions differ. Some say "the play is the thing," while other wiseacres argue, "the cast is the thing." Be that as it may, leave it to the astute B. S. Moss to find a happy solution in providing "The Power of Evil" with a cast headed by Marguerite Nichols that sweeps everything before it with its acting strength.

So much for the cast; now for the play. "The Power of Evil," the current Moss release, which comes to the screen from the expert pen of George Bronson Howard, an author whose reputation has progressed with the onward and upward trend of the motion picture game, is a photoplay that possesses every inherent quality that means success. Exhibitors who have handled "Three Weeks," "The Salamander" and "One Day," Moss' previous contributions to the screen, report that box office records have been smashed to smithereens by "The Power of Evil."

Universal Reaches Tenth Birthday

The week of Oct. 30 marked the tenth anniversary of Carl Laemmle's entrance into the exchange field. On that date in 1906 Carl Laemmle, then proprietor of the White Front Theater at 909 Milwaukee avenue, Chicago, and of the Laemmle Theater at 1233 Halsted street, issued his first program of Laemmle releases and took the first steps in the incorporation of the Laemmle Film Service, which a year later had branches in Minneapolis, Omaha, Evansville, Memphis, Salt Lake City, Portland, Winnipeg, Montreal and Des Moines.

The first program of Laemmle films was made up of two feature films, whereas the program for the week of October 30, 1916, contained thirty-three reels of films.

New Moss Play

A screen adaptation of "Boots and Saddles," from the play by Eugene Walters, which comes in five big reels, is now ready for release by B. S. Moss. It is the second release of the new Moss one-a-month policy, and, incidentally, should each succeeding release prove as much better to the one previous as this one does, the name of B. S. Moss should cut a wide swath in film circles.

Tom Holden, formerly cashier of the local Pathe office, has been transferred to Des Moines in the corresponding position.

Miss Mamie Wehr, who for the past six years has been in charge of the ticket booths at the various Hyman Brothers houses, has been engaged by Ascher Brothers for their Lane Court Theater which will open on November 11. Miss Wehr makes a special effort to learn patrons' names and greet them with a smile and a friendly nod as they walk up to purchase tickets. These little things are of course appreciated by patrons.

Wells Hawkes, special press representative for Mary Pickford, was in Chicago last week.

The following out of town exhibitors came to Chicago last week on business: J. H. Tihe, Grand Theater, Elwood, Indiana; Don Vestor, Court Theater, Kankakee, Illinois; Tom Norman, Rex Theater, Racine, Wisconsin; "Daddy" Hines, Auditorium Theater, South Bend, Indiana; Manager Wilson, K. & S. Sifted from the Studios

PACIFIC COAST NOTES

James Kirkwood, who directs Mary Miles Minter pictures at the American studios, was married recently at Los Angeles to Gertrude Robinson, a screen actress.

In the Selig production, "The Light of Western States," Tom Mix plunges from the top of a cliff hundreds of feet into a ravine.

Dr. C. Bachman has organized a company to manufacture children's pictures. The studio is located at Glendale.

Ah Woo, an eighty-five year old Chinaman, is working in the current William S. Hart picture.

Louella Maxam is leaving the Keystone Company to join her husband, who is one of the Signal players.

Frank Reicher will direct the next production in which Fannie Ward will appear. It is reported that Miss Ward will wear overalls throughout most of the scenes.

Cleo Madison is being featured at Universal City in a five-reel production, "The Reward of the Faithless," under the direction of Rex Ingram. Wedgwood Nowell is playing opposite the star. The story was written by E. Magnus Ingleton of the Universal staff.

"Tramp Tramp Tramp," now being produced at the Christie studios by Directors Al Christie and Horace Daveys, is not a preparedness film as its title might suggest. It merely refers to the species hobo, being represented in the comedy by Billie Rhodes and Harry Ham.

William De Mille, after completing the Thomas-Meighan-Anita King production, "The Heir to the Hoorah," at the Lasky studios, has gone to New York for several weeks' vacation.

In her new production, "Cinders," Marie Doro is seen first as a street waif and later as a fashionable society girl.

Hobart Bosworth is to have a big role in the Lasky production of "The Darling of the Gods," which C. B. De Mille will direct when he returns to the studio after his trip to New York.

Anna Luther was in demand last week by two of Los Angeles' most prominent photographers as the subject of certain artistic photographs to be used throughout the country in art panels.

Edward J. Le Saint has completed the Lasky production of "The Soul of Kura-San," in which Sessue Hayakawa appears, supported by Myrtle Stedman. In Hayakawa's next picture, his wife, Tsuru Aoki, will play feminine lead. Le Saint will also direct this play.

Elliott Dexter played in three different pictures in one day recently. In the morning he was leading man for Marie Doro under the direction of James Young. At noon he did a few scenes as leading man for Blanche Sweet under the direction of Marshall Neilan, and toward evening he played opposite Mae Murray under the direction of Robert Leonard.

William Russell of the American Film Company entertained a week-end house party at his Santa Barbara ranch last week. A horseback ride into the mountains, where a barbecue had been prepared, was a feature of the entertainment offered by the host. His guests were V. R. Day, Vola Smith, Albert Russell, Mrs. Elizabeth Smith, Rena Rogers, Charlotte Burton, Frank Borzage, Sherry Hall, George Ahern, E. A. Kaufman, Harvey Clark, Anna Little, Alan Forrest, May Cloy, Mr. Kolb, George Sargent and Mabel Condon.

William D. Taylor has completed the production of Kathlyn William's first picture for the Paramount program. It is said to contain some remarkable acting by Miss Williams. The working title, "Redeeming Love," may be retained.

Marin Sais is working in number thirteen of "The Girl From Frisco" serial. All she has to do for it is to fall off a horse, roll down a cliff, jump off a train into the water and ride bareback.

Frank Lloyd of the Fox forces is busy on a production starring William Farnum. In the support are Charles Clary, Frank Clark and Vivian Rich.

Hobart Henley, in addition to acting, is proving his skill as author and director. He wrote, directed and acted in "Somewhere on the Battlefield," which is winning praise, and he is now directing and starring in "Little Italy," a five-reel feature written by Willard Mack.

Gilbert P. Hamilton, managing director of the Century Company, will, on his return to Los Angeles, secure a studio and start producing the Ella Wheeler Wilcox features.

Frank Borzage has completed his last American five-reel feature, "Immediate Lee."

Oscar Apfel is nearing the completion of his five-reel underworld story, which has Gladys Brockwell and Eleanor Crowe in the leading feminine roles.

Bennie Suslow, well known boy actor, is playing an important role in the Universal feature, "The Scapegrace," under the direction of George Cochrane.

Sessue Hayakawa has begun work on a new production, "Each to His Kind," written by Paul West. Edward J. Le Saint will direct.

Edward Sloman, who has completed production of the sequel to "The Diamond From the Sky," is to direct William Russell in five-reel features.

J. Warren Kerrigan is filling in the period until his contract with the Universal Company expires by playing in a series of one-reel photoplays from specially selected stories.

Neva Gerber is playing the role of a chorus girl who aids a detective in solving a mystery, in a series of five two-reel Universal pictures being directed by Stuart Paton.

J. P. McGowan and Helen Holmes are still in the northern part of California with their company obtaining wonderful scenery for their serial, "The Lass of the Lumberlands."

Wallace Reid and Cleo Ridgley have begun work at the Lasky studio on "The Yellow Pawn," in which they will co-star. George H. Melford is directing.

Hobart Bosworth and Tully Marshall have signed long time contracts to appear exclusively in Lasky productions. Lillian Leighton is also a newcomer to the Lasky company.

So pleased were Kolb and Dill with the acting of Tom Chatterton in the third feature they appeared in at Santa Barbara that he has again been selected to play the juvenile lead in their next venture.

Mutual Film Corporation: A rumor is current to the effect that a new company is being organized to handle feature pictures to be released through the Mutual Film Corporation. The business booked will be on a percentage basis, which will result in additional revenue to the Mutual, and details will probably be made public in a short time. Mutual stock continues to be in demand and several blocks of common have changed hands in the last few days.

Lincoln Film Corporation: This new company was recently organized by Mutual interests, with a capitalization divided into $100,000 of 7% cumulative preferred stock, retirable at 110, and $300,000 of common, to exploit the fifteen-chapter serial, "Lass of the Lumberlands," featuring Helen Holmes. The stock was immediately subscribed for, due probably to the success of the States Film Corporation which was organized along similar lines.

North American Film Corporation: Trading in the common stock continues brisk. It is reported the sequel is extremely good and has lots of punch.

Lone Star Corporation: It is the present intention of the company to retire the preferred stock at the rate of 25% every sixty days. This would retire the issue by June next. Trading in both common and preferred has been rather light recently, the general opinion being that the company will show greater activity with each new Chaplin release.

Complete Record of Current Films

This record is intended to give, for the convenient use of the exhibitor in booking films, all the information about each film that it is possible to present in a space limited to one line. The classification is indicated by the letter at the left (D for drama, C for comedy, T for topical, S for scenic, E for educational, etc.) Next comes the date and the title, followed by the names of the stars in parentheses. At the extreme right hand end of the line is the distributor's booking number, preceded by the name of the producing company. The figure appearing just before this name indicates the number of reels—the italic letter S meaning a split reel.

Mary Norton, wife of Robert, is happy in the anticipation of approaching motherhood, and her husband, in the meantime, comes to the realization that he is bound to the shackles of the morphine habit, and as time goes on he sacrifices wife, home and happiness for the insidious drug. One night a vision of what might have been comes to Robert as he sleeps under the influence of dope, and with one mighty effort he severs habit's cables and once more becomes a man. The man raises the tip each time and the movers continue their trips with increasing profits. At nightfall Turpin and his accomplice break into the house and find the safe empty. This will never do. So they fill it with cigars, wines, tapestry and everything else available. Then it becomes a safe worthy of stealing. Esmond, growing bold, makes advances to the girl, and is frustrated by Dick. When the elder Mason finds his son is making good he invites him to return home. Manners and his daughter are dinner guests. When the two clerks meet in these surroundings the girl produces a note written the day before by Dick. It reads: "I told you I was going to marry you. The Boomerang Theater, the £10,000 structure, has been officially opened by the mayor of Randwick, the suburb in which it was erected. A great number of guests were present by invitation. The opening feature was "Tennessee's Pardner" (Lasky Famous-Players).

A few of the principal American features showing at the different theaters at present include: "Honor Thy Name" (Kay-Bee), "Little Meena's Romance" (Fine Arts), "The Man Who Could Not Kill His Conscience" (Vitagraph), "The Hand of Peril" (World-Brady), "The Battle of Hearts" (Fox), "The Foundling" (Famous Players), "Lovely Mary" (Metro).

"The Mutiny of Bounty," produced in Australia by Raymond Longford for the Cricks and Jones organization, has been released in Sidney. Not in the history of the industry in Australia has there been a picture that has come up to the standard of this production. The main plot of the story deals with the adventurous journey of two thousand miles in an open boat by Captain Bligh and a number of the "Bounty" crew, across the ocean. The great majority of the locations were secured in New Zealand, famous for its excellent beauty spots. The whole play with good photography scored a decided hit. "The Mutiny of the Bounty" had its premiere at Hoyt's Theater, and being endorsed by the educational department as a fine historical subject, 2,000 school children were given the liberty of witnessing the initial screening.

The Frazer Film Company, film distributors, film hirers and manufacturers in this country, have started the production of an animated news gazette. Bert Segerburg, a professional cameraman, has charge of the Sydney studio department affairs, whilst a cameraman in every state will forward his "negs" to head office for distribution.

Messrs. Vogel and Howell, representing David Howell's of Australia and The Co-operative Film Service of New Zealand, have made arrangements whereby these two companies will distribute Ivan productions in Australia and New Zealand. The first two Ivan productions to be shown in this territory will be "Faded Flower" and "Her Surrender," prints of which have already been shipped to this territory.

These pictures will be first exhibited about the first of November in both Australia and New Zealand.

NO CHANGE IN GENERAL

General Film Company has made preliminary announcement regarding its fall and winter program in which it is stated there will be no change in its releasing plans; that Selig, Essanay, Lubin, Vitagraph, Kalem, Knickerbocker, and Biograph productions will be identified as heretofore with General Film Service. The George Kleine and Thomas A. Edison interests with the General Film Company remain identically the same as before. The exact make-up of the program will be announced in a few days.

This means that General Film Company feels that the best interests of exhibitors will be conserved in pursuing the same lines laid down when the present administration, under the direction of President George Kleine, took hold of the reins. The same predominating policy of presenting distinguished satrs in short length pictures will prevail. This announcement, coming from General Film Company's advertising and publicity department, will no doubt be welcomed by exhibitors. The preliminary statement by General Film Company concludes with this paragraph:

"General Film Company purposes to do in the future as it has in the past—lead. It blazed the way, maintained always a commanding position, served faithfully the best interests of exhibitors, won the public's confidence, produced pictures abreast of the times and made it possible for exhibitors to earn liberally in proportion to their investment. A program of variety, quality and consistency such as is furnished by General Film Service is responsible in a large degree for the unquestioned popularity of moving pictures today, and there is no reason to change this policy.

"Noted stars in short length productions will be a feature of our fall and winter program. Exhibitors everywhere have indorsed this policy by subscribing to General Film Service and business with the General Film Company has increased steadily. It is a permanent growth due to the excellence of our service. There will be improvements of course in the service where improvement is deemed essential and exhibitors will always have the assurance that they are offering a program unequaled by competitors.

"There will be no change in General Film Company's numerous branches covering the United States and Canada and our customers will be served with the same promptness and regularity that has always characterized General Film Service. There will be no waste of printer's ink in conducting a campaign based on braggadocio but an effective comprehensive advertising campaign calculated to best serve exhibitors has been decided upon. We pledge that General Film Service will be best and we will keep our pledge."

According to Albert E. Smith, of Vitagraph, a director of the General Film Company, more than 6000 theaters are now using General Film Service. This is probably a greater number than is served by any other distributor.

STAGE SCENE 6,000 FEET BELOW GROUND

A company of motion picture players headed by Vivian Martin, recently filmed several underground scenes at the famous Empire mine in Grass Valley, California. Some of these scenes were photographed 6,000 feet below the ground under extreme difficulties.

This is the first time in the history of motion pictures that scenes were ever filmed at this depth. They were made for Miss Martin's photoplay, "The Right Direction."

In speaking of the undertaking one of the officials of the Pallas Pictures, said, "These mines are among the most famous gold mines of the world. When I studied mining engineering thirty years ago, these mines were quoted as the deepest in the world, namely 750 feet below the ground. They are now over 6,000 feet deep on the incline and have steadily produced gold from the time of their discovery. They lie near the famous old Idaho mine in Grass Valley which produced seventeen million dollars from the grass routes down. We were most fortunate in securing permission to use these mines and expect to get the most wonderful backgrounds in these scenes ever displayed in views of this nature."

DANISH ACTOR STUDIES U. S.

Benjamin Christie, the noted Danish actor who is seen in the stellar role of "Blind Justice," a seven-reel production of the Dansk Biograf Company of Copenhagen, Denmark, a feature which he wrote and directed as well as played in, is probably as high an authority on the technical points of picture-making as any in the world. While in this country, in the interests of "Blind Justice," he is making a profound study of American producing, with a view to embodying it in a work he is writing which embraces the methods and criticises the faults and sets forth the merits of studios in England, Germany, France, Austria, Italy, Russia, yes and Japan!

So far the assiduous Mr. Christie has visited two or three studios every day and viewed from four to five features as an average. Next to Russia, where the censorship rule is simple, consisting of "Go as far as you like," Mr. Christie says he is inclined to think American censorship singularly fair and open minded.

Valkyrien, or the Baroness DeWitz, is one of those late fall bathers. And it's natural for she played with the breakers on the coast of Denmark when she was only a little tot. The Danish beauty was formerly a Thanhouseran, is now suing Fox for breach of contract, and may organize a producing company of her own in the near future.

DAINTY ACTRESS DUCKED

Yvette Mitchell, dainty lead in the company directed by P. C. Hartigan of Universal City, had an unexpected "ducking" one day recently while the company was making exteriors in Laurel canyon, Hollywood, for the play "Lord Helpus Investigates."

Miss Mitchell was standing by a tree close to the bank of a small stream when Ernest Shields, opposite whom she plays, in hurrying out of a scene accidentally ran full force into her and she fell head first into the water. Eugene Walsh, one of the members of the company, unhesitatingly dived into the stream after Miss Mitchell and brought her safely back, not much the worse for her rather sudden wetting.

The Herald Film Corporation announce that both the Loew and Proctor Circuits, after seeing "The Prima Donna's Husband," immediately booked the same for all their theaters.

Chicago Branch for Association

JOHN R. FREULER ELECTED HEAD OF NEW SECTION OF NATIONAL ORGANIZATION

AS a part of its plan to be really representative of every phase of the industry in every important center in the country, the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry on November 3 took the preliminary steps toward the organization of a Chicago branch of the Association. This branch is to be known officially as the Chicago advisory executive committee.

Because of the fact that President Freuler of the Mutual Film Corporation is one of the most prominent film men in the central west, the organization meeting was held in his offices on State street and he was by acclamation elected chairman of the Chicago committee. Present at the meeting were more than a score of the representatives of various ramifications of the film industry. Mr. Freuler appointed a committee which is to evolve a basis and ratio of representation for the five classifications of membership in the National Association. The members of this committee are: Mr. Freuler, chairman; Watterson R. Rothacker, president Industrial Motion Picture Corporation; Joseph Choynski, Newberry Theater; Donald Bell, Bell and Howell Equipment Company; Isaac Von Ronkle, Blue Bird representative, and John Bowman, manager, Chicago office International Film Service.

John R. Freuler, prominent film executive, who heads Chicago branch of National Association.

Frederick H. Elliott, executive secretary of the National Association, spoke at the gathering and discussed the plans and purposes of the organization, and also indicated the broad field of co-operation and activity opened to the Chicago organization.

While the general purposes of the National Association extend to every interest of the industry it was clearly indicated that the censorship evil, in both state and national aspects, would be the object of first attack, with Ohio and Pennsylvania first on the list.

"Very frankly, I have waited until this time before deciding to join the National Association," said Mr. Freuler, "until I could be convinced that the organization would be genuinely representative, and until I could be sure that it had a chance to accomplish some of the things which must be done for this industry. Now that the Mutual and I are in this organization I want to do the utmost to make it a success, to make it efficiently serve all of the interests it is designed to aid and protect. We need everybody's co-operation and if we do not get it we can not hope to accomplish much. We must have a majority of those in the industry."

Among those who attended the meeting were:

John R. Freuler, president Mutual Film Corporation, Chicago; Frederick H. Elliott, executive secretary, National Association; George K. Bird, Brayton Mfg. Co., 6 North Michigan avenue, Chicago; O. F. Spahr, Enterprise Optical Mfg. Co., 564 West Randolph street, Chicago; Mr. Green, manager, Kleine Optical Co., 166 North State street; John F. Bowman, International F. Serv., Inc., 207 Wabash avenue; W. Dunham, president, Sunbeam Motion Picture Co., 208 South La Salle street; A. C. Roebuck, Sears Roebuck & Company, Chicago; W. R. Rothacker, president, Rothacker Film Mfg. Co., 223 West Erie street, Chicago; J. P. Seeburg, J. P. Seeburg Piano Company, 209 South State street; Maurice A. Choynski, Newberry Theater; director in National Association; Donald J. Bell, president, Bell & Howell Co.; Louis H. Frank, exhibitor; Oma M. Lawrence, Evening Post, Chicago; I. Van Ronkle, manager, Bluebird Photoplays, Inc., Chicago; Joseph Trinz, Lubliner and Trinz, exhibitors, 510 Westminster building, Chicago; Arthur E. Curtis, MOTOGRAPHY; Joseph Hopp, 179 West Washington street; H. Schoenstadt, 4930 Grand boulevard; Robert McKnight, Examiner, Chicago; W. D. Hildreth, Chicago manager, The Billboard; Alfred Hamburger, exhibitor, 207 South Wabash avenue; Terry Ramsaye, publicity director, Mutual Film Corporation, Chicago.

The work of organizing a third branch of the National Association has already been begun in Los Angeles. David Wark Griffith, Thomas H. Ince and other prominent film men of the coast have pledged their support and before long California will be a strong association center.

In the meantime continued work of organizing and admitting new members has been going on in the east. The Author's League, containing 1,400 members, has applied for a charter and the General Electric and Westinghouse people have applied for membership. It is also probable that the Western Electric in Chicago will make an application.

In order to raise money to promote the work of further organization the National Association will shortly issue a unique feature film, to contain the cream of all the past film love scenes, comedy scenes, thrillers, and so on. These scenes will be furnished by the various producers gratis and exhibitors have stated that such a feature should return the Association thousands of dollars.

EASTERN DIRECTORS ORGANIZE

Motion Picture Directors Form Association for Uplift of Silent Drama and Better Mutual Understanding

The Motion Picture Directors' Association of New York will be the name of the new organization which is being formed among the motion picture directors of the east, following the example set by the Pacific coast. Murdock MacQuarrie of Los Angeles came to New York to establish the organization on the same basis as the association of the west. This organization will be a secret one. It is not a labor union nor has it any great industrial grievances to mend. Its object will be the uplift of the silent drama and the better mutual understanding between various factors in the business.

With Mr. MacQuarrie came Burton King of the Metro Company, Charles Giblyn of Selznick, Travis Yale of the World, and Dell Henderson of the Famous Players, all delegated as recruiting officers for the New York fraternity.

Among those invited to the formative session and who are in full sympathy with the movement were Eugene Moore, Thanhouser; Fred Sullivan, Thanhouser; J. Gordon Edwards and K. Buel of the Fox Films; Ed Middleton, Harley Knoles, Harry Davenport and Emil Chautard of the World; Maurice Tourneur, Paragon; William F. Davis and Tefft Johnson of the Fox Films; Albert Chapellani, Clara Kimball Young Film Corporation; Herbert Brenon of Brenon Films; David McKensie, Pathe; Theodore Marston, McClure; Ralph Ince, Vitagraph; Laurence McGill and Howard Hansel of the Arrow; Jack Ridgley of Edison; Sydney Drew and Edward Laurence of Metro; Lucius Henderson, Laurence Marsden, George Baker, Metro; Joe Smiley, Oscar Eagle, Joe Kaufman, Frank Crane, William Humphreys, Jack Adolphi, Jack Vincent, William Haddock, Edwin August, Jack Noble and Edwin Carewe of the Metro; Edgar Lewis, Frank Purcell, Sidney Alcott, Robert Vignola and J. Searle Dawley of the Famous Players. O. A. C. Lund, Barry O'Neill, Fred Thompson of the Vitagraph; Ned Finlay, Edward Jose, George Fitzmaurice, Paul Scardon, William Quirk, O. J. Van Deusen, H. McRae Webster, Louis Gasnier of Pathe; Joe Totten, Allen D. Ware, William Night, Metro; King Baggot, Earl Metcalf, Harry Saulter and Webster Cullison.

Illinois Exhibitors Meet

As suggested at the October meeting of the Illinois Branch of the Exhibitors' League of America, the second open meeting of this body was held in the League's regular meeting rooms on the second floor of the Masonic Temple, Chicago, on November 3. Coffee and sandwiches were served gratis.

The most important action taken at the meeting was the election of Joseph Hopp to fill the vacancy in the League's executive committee caused by the fact that Fred Hartman, the former incumbent, has been called out of the city by his business interests.

A number of announcements were made, most important among them being that the work of getting the two local motion picture operators' unions to work in harmony was fast drawing to an end and that the two locals would in the near future amalgamate. Nothing was said regarding whether it will be Local 110 or Local 157 which will be absorbed.

More than 75 exhibitors were present, among them some of the biggest showmen and chain owners in the city.

Virginia Foltz, who in private life is the wife of Leslie D. Martin, wealthy real estate man of Los Angeles, has joined the film colony at Universal City.

Paul Scardon is finishing the final scenes of "The Little Brown Sparrow," a heart throb drama for release on Greater Vitagraph's program.

Screenshine

By Mel Ody

NOT so very long ago a prominent exhibitor (we won't give his name away) on Madison street, Chicago, bought a new car. It is an Elgin, so we suppose you have to wind it up in front to make it go.

The car was wound up too tight once, or something (the car we said) and as a result the nervous flivver sailed into a mail box, trimmed off the iron post, leaped at a drug store window and blew a front tire. Mr. Miller had to borrow another rubber from M. Reelfellow Watkins.

Harry claims that he wasn't driving the car when the accident happened. He blames it onto I. Shootum Lockwood, the cameraman.

At any rate, nobody's driving the car now. The main spring's busted.

INAGIN GONEAGIN

The following more or less notables breezed into the Airy City and out again last week: Thomas Meighan, swapped by Lasky to Famous Players; Alan Forrest, Anna Little's husband, who says he has left American and is going to rest at home in Cleveland; Sol Lesser, film salesman; George Fawcett, film actor; Hunter Bennett, Mutual man. And Max Linder, the German-Frenchman, is on the way from France.

George K. Spoor, big chief up at the Indian Head camp, probably got his idea for "screentime," in designating the size of pictures, from Screenshine. The sly rascal.

SERIAL CAUSES LOSS

Wallace MacDonald, who is working in a new Pauline Frederick picture for Famous Players, insists that Boonton, New Jersey, a town of no size located about an hour from New York, is fully sixty years behind today, and offers the following as convincing argument: One morning at breakfast in the village hostelry he noticed that the other man at the table had two eggs with his bacon while he had only one. An egg is worth at least an inquiry at the present price, so the next time the waitress came out of the kitchen he asked for an explanation. "Oh," she answered, without flickering an eyelash, "He didn't take any cereal. You did!"

A DOG-GONE GOOD INTERVIEW

"Well," said we, with great originality to Edna Mayo, last week, "Well, tell us something about yourself."

"Oh," she said, "Tell them what a good actor my dog is."

WAY TO SUCCESS IS THROUGH THE STOMACH.

Know how the daily change of program originated?

George Gotshall of the Bijou Dream says the fact that people eat lunch every day started it.

"They used to drop in here to rest and snooze during the noon hour," says George, "and finally they noticed we were running the same reels more than once. They asked for a change of diet and we gradually got into the habit of serving them something new every day."

So there you have something for your little encyclopedia.

"A Sister of Six, featuring Bessie Love, (Triangle)—Unfortunately this star has but little drawing power, people however seemed to enjoy the pranks of the clever Triangle kids and the success of the picture is largely to the credit of the kids. As a whole only a fair picture."—Martin Saxe, Knickerbocker Theater.—Patronage consists of the middle and upper classes.

"A Diplomatic Service, featuring Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne, (Metro)—Continuity in this picture is sadly disregarded, which really is the only complaint one might make against it. The drawing power of the picture can not be questioned considering who is featured.—S. Trinz, Covent Garden Theater.—Neighborhood house, catering to the better classes.

"A Corner in Colleens, with the popular Bessie Barriscale featured, (Triangle)—If there was one of my patrons who after seeing this production did not think he or she had gotten his or her money's worth they were ashamed to admit it. The subtitles in this picture are really wonderful, there is a punch in everyone and a person cannot help but like this production. It is five reels of the cleanest comedy I have ever seen."—Harry Miller, Boston Theater.—Downtown house.

"In the Heart of the Hills, staring Mabel Trunelle, (K. E. S. E.)—In view of the fact that this star has appeared in so many 'Moon Shiner' pictures and this type not being in popular demand by picture followers, the name of the picture led many to believe it another of this type, and resulted in a considerable loss of patronage. Manufacturers cannot be too careful in selecting titles for their products."—L. A. Cuneo, De Luxe Theater.—Catering to a critical type of audience.

The following comments on the Artcraft-Pickford picture, "Less Than the Dust," from leading New York theaters that had just started week runs of the feature.

The Strand (New York): "The new Pickford feature is playing to the usual capacity business. The picture is taking well with the people. We turned them away on Sunday."

Broadway Theater: "Surpassed previous records on any previous Pickford picture Sunday. 'Less Than the Dust' surely pleases."

Glynne and Ward's Century Theater, Brooklyn, says: "We couldn't accommodate the crowds on Sunday. It's a fine picture."

Give the Children a Good Time

J. A. SHAFFER, FROLIC THEATER, CHICAGO, SUCCESSFUL CHILDREN'S EXHIBITOR

By B. F. Barrett

IN a neighborhood which contains a Home for Incurables, a Home for the Aged, a park, a hospital and a large university, most managers of motion picture theaters would feel that they did not have much to draw from for a special matinee for children, and yet J. A. Shaffer, manager of Ascher's Frolic Theater, Chicago, is running one of the most successful kiddies matinees in the city, and has been running these special performances for two years with an average weekly attendance of between four and five hundred.

This record undoubtedly shows good management but it also shows good judgment and a knowledge of psychology. Mr. Shaffer is an exception from another angle also. Almost every exhibitor who is running a children's program admits that the ladies of the neighborhood came to him and asked that he start this special performance and that is the way he began, but Mr. Shaffer says no one ever asked him to have these matinees for the little folks he just started them himself.

When Mr. Shaffer was asked what he considered the keynote of his success with these kiddies entertainments his answer was, "Giving the children a good time." He then went on to say, "The children come to my theater because they want to come and not because their mother has told them they must come. They know there is a party for children every Saturday afternoon at the Frolic Theater and all their friends will be going and naturally they want to be there too. They know they will have a good time and see some pictures which they will like and can understand. They also know they will not be expected to keep the same kind of order they do in the school room, they can walk around if they get tired, can talk to their friends and do just as they please, and there will be hundreds of other children there to do it with them. The success of these matinees for the kiddies does not rest so much with the pictures which are shown as with the atmosphere of the theater. Children are very sensitive to impressions and the minute they enter this theater on Saturday afternoon they catch the spirit of good time that pervades the place. And because they are not forced to come but come of their own free will I have very little of what might be called disorder in the house. They are not quiet and they are not still for if they do not care especially for some one film—and of course I have to show a variety to please all—they go over and sit down by some little friend and have a chat. Sometimes they will change their seats twelve times or more during the afternoon—but they are enjoying themselves and that is what they came for. When the comedy is flashed on the screen, however, all moving around and talking ceases, and laughing begins instead. They do love comedies and they get much more out of them than the older people because their sense of humor is very keen—and it is easy to laugh when there are so many other children to laugh with you.

The attractive and well-designed program cover for the Frolic's youngster matinees.

"If the people who are advocating special pictures for children would forget the educational part and try to give the children a good time they would accomplish their end much quicker. Older people do not care to go to the motion picture theater to be educated they go for amusement, so why deprive the children of this same entertainment and force education upon them under the guise of pleasure?"

Every Friday at noon programs of the Frolic Theater advertising the children's matinee are distributed not only at the neighborhood school but to all schools in a reachable radius. A reproduction of the attractive cover design of these programs is given on this page. On the back of the program is a message to the parents which reads: "Mothers and fathers are invited to bring the young ones to our Special Matinees on Saturday Afternoon. It is our aim to furnish entertainment of the kind that will appeal to all children and please the grown-ups as well. Special care will be given the children who may come alone. Nothing objectionable will be shown and parents may place implicit confidence in the quality of entertainment the kiddies will see. The Children's performance will start promptly at two o'clock. The Frolic Orchestra will be on hand to furnish the music."

In the distribution of these programs to the school children Mr. Shaffer gives an example of this good judgment which has brought him success. These programs are not handed to the children as they come out of school because they come surging out in great crowds and are in such a hurry to get away that a large proportion of them would not receive the notices at all. Instead the programs are handed out as they come to school in the afternoon. Then they walk along in small groups and are in no hurry. Every one gets a program and they have time to talk over the show and make their plans for going together the next day.

Mr. Shaffer claims: "The reason why so many exhibitors have made a financial failure of these special entertainments is that they are afraid to charge enough. They ask five cents admission and you cannot make a success of these shows at that price. I charge ten cents for every person entering the house, even the three-year-olds, and although the children are admitted at the matinees every other day for five cents and only have to pay five cents in the evenings they come and put down their dime willingly for their own matinee.

"Another reason why managers make a failure of these matinees is that they do not go into them with any enthusiasm. They are afraid that the special performance will spoil their Saturday night business. But they are very much mistaken here for instead of spoiling it they make the night's attendance larger. My daily records show that before I started these matinees the evening attendance was smaller than it is with them, and added to this is the fact that the afternoon audience is about twice as large, and I am collecting ten cents from everyone there. This by way of encouraging the exhibitor who is afraid to start these matinees because of the probable financial deficit.

"Another mistake which exhibitors make is the time at which they show this special program. Saturday morning performances are almost never a success in any neighborhood theater. A downtown house running a breakfast matinee for children is different because it has the whole city from which to draw, but the community house cannot get the children out in the morning. To set aside an hour before the regular afternoon matinee is also a mistake, I believe, because it means the child must be there at just such a time or lose the show. This keeps many children away who would otherwise come but cannot get ready by one o'clock. With my program the whole afternoon is devoted to the little folks and they can come any time they please, but at the same time I show the regular feature which I am going to run at night so that I have a large attendance of grown people also. The children are allowed to stay to the whole show if they want to but most of the mothers tell them to leave when the big picture is shown, so they get only the special films planned for them. If the feature is one which the children will enjoy I run it first so that they can see it, and also it gives them all time to get in to be sure they see the smaller reels which are planned for them. If the feature does not especially appeal to the child I run the special films first and then they have had enough and are ready to leave before the feature is shown. Very few of them care to sit through a five reel play after they have already had four or five reels of pictures they really like.

"There is one feature which will always appeal to the children and bring a full house and that is a child entertainer. I don't know just why it is but the children love to watch another child perform. Very often I have a child come and sing or dance and the afternoon on which this is advertised always means a big crowd. They do not care to have older people come and tell them stories or try to entertain them but they do love to watch other children.

"Another thing the children love is to have something to take home with them. They do not care how small or inexpensive it is but it appeals strongly to feel that they have been given something which they can take with them. It means an extension of their good time after they have left the theater. At the first matinee after the people had returned from their summer vacations I wanted to regain their steady patronage for the winter so I added an extra attraction to my program in the form of a Punch and Judy show. The children, of course, were delighted with this, but what really pleased them the most was the little whistle which I gave to every child as they came out of the theater. The toys did not cost anything at all to speak of and yet the very fact that I advertised they would be given away brought out a great crowd, and the children went away feeling they had received more than their money's worth. My program was so long on this afternoon that I could only run it once, and it was amusing to hear so many of the grown people express their disappointment because they arrived too late to see the Punch and Judy performance. I really think they felt worse than the children who missed it."

When Mr. Shaffer was asked, "What about the supply of films for children's programs? Do you find that it is hard to secure those which are suitable?" he replied in a most emphatic manner: "The exhibitor who says that he does not run children's programs because it is so hard to find films suitable for such an entertainment is simply making an excuse—and a mighty poor one at that, as anyone knows who has looked into this matter at all. I have been running children's programs for two years and have had no difficulty whatever in securing all the films I want—and I don't use the same ones over and over again, either. Also, I know that there are plenty of films right here in Chicago to run my shows for two years more with films which the children will like. The trouble with the exhibitor is he don't know what the children will like or he is afraid to plan a really good program for them for fear the women of the neighborhood who have asked him to run these shows might not like what he chose. And right here I would like to say that if the women's clubs and Parent-Teacher Associations would not try to drive the exhibitor, but would allow him to co-operate with them instead, they would obtain the desired results very much quicker. The women do not seem to look at this matter from the standpoint of the child; neither do they look at it through the eyes of the showman. Here is a man who probably has been running a motion picture theater for five years and making a success of it. The ladies will go to him and ask that he start a program for the kiddies, but they will allow him no voice in the matter whatever. They are not willing to listen to his superior knowledge, and together work out a real program, but instead, they come with their own ideas, which must be carried out in their own way, and the exhibitor is helpless and hindered and makes a failure of what, with the co-operation of the women, he could make a great success.

"Speaking of the number of suitable films there are, there is another point which should appeal to the exhibitor along this line, and that is the fact that you do not have to show all the very latest releases to the little folks. There are many old films which they like even better, and, of course, there is no comparison in the cost of a latest release and an old film. For example, I showed last week one of the first pictures that Charlie Chaplin made and the children were just as wild about it as they would have been over his latest. With this great saving on films and the stated price of ten cents admission, there is no reason why any exhibitor should say that children's matinees are always a financial failure.

"From my own experience, I would give the following advice to a fellow-exhibitor who wants to make a success of these special performances for the kiddies—plan your program from the child's viewpoint, give the youngsters a good time, make the atmosphere of your theater on Saturday afternoon one of happiness and freedom, be sure that the kiddies have some good laughs, and you will not have to ask the aid of the parents to make the children come to your special matinees—instead they are liable to run away from home to get there."

Library at Studio

An appropriation of $5,000 has been set aside for the installation of a bigger and more complete library at the Ince-Triangle studios in Culver City. There always has been a research department at the disposal of the Ince authors and directors, but the general expansion of the literary staff has necessitated a commensurate expansion of the book-shelves. Miss Florence Vincent has been placed in charge of the work of selecting the volumes to be purchased and is now engaged in combing the big book-stores of Los Angeles.

Good Music Aids Chicago Chain

A GREAT many elements enter into the successful exhibition of motion pictures, much depending on the exhibitor being fully conversant with the likes and dislikes of his patrons and supplying their wants irrespective of what these wants may be.

The exhibitor is now sometimes compelled to take the picture regardless of whether it is good or bad.

The Vitagraph, one of the Lubliner and Trinz houses in Chicago.

While a picture may be of a type in general favor at a theater, as a whole it may be a poor picture and must be run or a heavy financial loss experienced.

On occasions of this sort is where the music in a theater becomes an important factor. The mind of the ordinary human is susceptible to outside influence and can be swayed, proper methods being properly applied.

If a poor picture is being shown, an effort should be made to influence the major portion of an audience's attention to the music and away from the picture. More emphasis should be put on the music, which will naturally help out the picture by diverting attention to some extent.

The foregone is not an expression of opinion from an exhibitor, but the experiences of the writer who in his daily work comes in contact with a great number of exhibitors who often have very "poor opinions" of various pictures and express them to me. I have often a few days later attended performances at one of the Lubliner and Trinz houses and was really entertained when everybody else who had seen the picture at some other theater labeled it "poor." This started me on a search for a reason and the foregone paragraphs mirror my conclusions.

These also are, I think, the reasons why not one of the Lubliner and Trinz houses has been a "lemon." The accompanying illustration is a picture of the Vitagraph, one of this organization's theaters, situated on one of the busiest business streets in Chicago and in a hot-bed of competition. The greater portion of the competition is and has been running at a loss while this house has made money right along and is still doing so.

The theater seats one thousand persons. The latest approved ventilation system has been installed, fresh air being pumped into the house through the ceiling and the consumed air is exhausted from under each seat, through these same channels the house is heated in winter. The music at this house is supplied by a splendid pipe organ and a six-piece orchestra. Matinees, starting at two o'clock, are played each day. A feature and one and two-reel comedies make up the program of this house.

The resident manager, E. D. Dlouhy, makes it a point to become personally acquainted with his patrons, making an effort to determine what they think of the picture they have just seen. This helps him in a great many ways and gives him an idea on how to approach his clientele the next time he advertises the coming of a picture of a similar type.

Utilizing a Parish Fair

By Peter Trocchiano

Manager Pastime Theater, St. Francisville, Louisiana.

In connection with a Parish fair which is running in our town for three days I have arranged a contest voting scheme whereby the patrons of my house who attend my show each of the three nights of the fair are entitled to vote on the best picture shown on those three nights.

A special announcement card headed "$10 in Gold Given Away at the Pastime Theater" was sent out. This card carried a picture of Nance O'Neil in colors on the back so that it was sure to be saved by anyone receiving it. The announcement read in part:

We have booked for Thursday, Friday and Saturday productions of the following companies: Metro, Fox and Mutual. For convenience in the contest the pictures will represent the three above-mentioned divisions of the fair, i. e.: Metro—automobile; Fox—champion bull under two years old; Mutual—baby. Those patronizing our theater for these three shows will each be given a coupon, and upon presentation on Saturday night the holder of each coupon received will be entitled to one vote for each, provided you present coupons showing attendance at all three shows.

Cast your vote for the production you like best and it will count for the divisions as above named.

The votes as cast will award the prize as follows: If the Metro picture receives the greatest number of votes the ten dollars in gold will go to the winner in the "decorated auto contest," if the Mutual picture wins the ten dollars will be given to the winner in the "best baby contest," and if the Fox picture wins the winner of the "best bull contest" will receive the money.

This contest is causing much comment among the people of the town and it is expected that our theater will be packed each of the three evenings.

Special Lighting and Music in Seattle House

Special from the Liberty Theater, Seattle.

"The Old Folks at Home," Rupert Hughes' story, starring Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree, was the screen classic that admirably lent itself to the unusual lighting and musical effects that are the "hobbies" of J. G.

Stage of the Liberty, of Seattle, showing the interesting "boxes" on either side, from which were worked unique lighting and scenic effects.

von Herberg of the Liberty Theater, Seattle, and his publicity manager, "100% Fullerton." The very title suggests a quaint, homely and picturesque "Way Down East" homestead.

On each side of the Liberty screen are boxes, in which were employed the lighting effects. The theater was completely darkened, as the familiar strains of "Home, Sweet Home" were heard on the giant unit orchestra. At the end of the first bar, the left hand box was lighted up, revealing an old homestead in the soft glow of the sunset. This quickly deepened to twilight when the windows of the house were illuminated. From twilight the scene darkened to night, the stars coming out one by one, the moon, a crescent, casting its pale beams down the walk faintly revealing the quaint old picket fence in the foreground.

At this point a dim red light was noticeable in the right hand box made to resemble an old-fashioned sixteen-framed window. This strengthened gradually showing "the old folks at home" seated before the fireplace, the glow of which faintly suggested the outlines of the room. It takes much longer to tell of the staging than it did to operate, for all this was done while the organist played "Home, Sweet Home." The effect produced on the audience was dramatic in the extreme, for in spite of the tears it brought, the applause was instantaneous and prolonged.

The title strip of the picture was flashed on the velvet curtain, which was raised in time to frame the author's announcement. To heighten the staging effect our Mr. Fullerton rearranged the screen story so that the picture play opened on the Coburn homestead, showing the interior of the kitchen with its homely domestic characters. The cookie-stealing episode produced a hearty laugh, proving a very satisfactory safety valve for the emotions of the audience stirred up by the music and staging. The action introducing Sir Herbert Tree immediately followed this scene and from there on the story was the same as sent to us.

Unusual business greeted this picture play and so many comments and compliments were received on it, that Mr. Wallace, our organist, held over the effect another day for his Sunday noon concert, and played a request number of "Home Sweet Home" with the above mentioned lighting effects.

The photograph accompanying this is a flashlight and only shows the bare scenes, as the lighting effects cannot be shown in a photograph. We have removed the scrim curtains which were placed in front of the scenes to soften the details and lend perspective, so that the photographer could get a sharp and contrasty picture.

Large newspaper ads, 12 inches deep on four columns, were taken to give publicity to the above bill. A Keystone comedy was also run. The prices were, matinees, ten cents; evenings, fifteen; children, five cents.

"Health, Happiness and Satisfaction"

The Victoria Theater of Buffalo, singles out the vital desires of every human being and makes a direct appeal to them in the following editorial which appeared on a recent issue of that house's splendid program. The theater that means "health, happiness and satisfaction" should have a very important place in its community and do a good business. At any rate, the following contains an advantageous angle of appeal:

LOOKING AHEAD!

Health, happiness and satisfaction are milestones along the VICTORIA road to perfect entertainment.

Just look ahead!

There they loom before you as does a brook to the thirst-parched traveler in the wide desert.

When you are morose, pessimistic and in the grip of mental fatigue—you are thirsty for the diversion that the VICTORIA is proud to provide.

Just look ahead!

In the future, the very near future—the VICTORIA will bring to you as it has in the past, the greatest motion productions of the picture world. Famous actors and actresses await their turn to appear before your gaze at the VICTORIA.

"The Scarlet Crystal," a feature in five reels, is being picturized at Universal City.

MOTOGRAPHY:

On page 260 of the issue of October 14 of ——— the criticism of "Her Double Life" (Fox) says "A five-reel melodrama with a crude plot. It is not very interesting. The story is poor and there is no particular able acting in it."

Well, the writer had the extreme pleasure of seeing this picture at the Boston theater, Chicago, and I consider it one of the best features I ever saw. If I were alone in that opinion it would be different, but I note in MOTOGRAPHY that Manager Moore of the Orpheum, Chicago, says it's great and he seems to be holding down his job pretty well, and we note in MOTOGRAPHY, page 855, October 14 issue, that Mrs. Quinn of Rock Island traveled nearly 300 miles to re-book it, so can only conclude that the critic?!?? who reviewed that subject for the other publication is either incompetent or was drunk when he saw it or he took into consideration the fact that Fox does not extensively advertise in his paper.

We have never run a Fox Feature, but have seen some dandies lately, and we like fair play. We like the idea of criticisms from showmen instead of trade journal critics.

Please publish this over our signature.

P. S.—Also note in your issue Jack Haag of the Bandbox, Chicago, says, "Great picture. Broke all records."

"Split Reel" Notes for Theater Men

HOW OTHERS ARE STEERING THE SHIP

WHEN you run a picture containing Owen Moore do you always advertise him as Mary Pickford's husband? Manager Weil of the Castle, one of the leading downtown houses of Chicago, does. And he says it means that he gets bigger business than the name of Moore alone would draw. At any rate he held them out with "The Kiss" last week.

The guests of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York were entertained, while awaiting the presidential returns, election night, by a film exhibition.

A number of Chicago theater audiences were pleasantly surprised last week when the "Reel Fellows" rushed Richard Travers from house to house to advertise their ball.

E. E. Levin has accepted a position as manager of the Kayancee Film Corporation, Minneapolis. Mr. Levin was formerly manager of the Commercial Motion Picture Company of the same city.

R. O. Proctor, formerly manager of Metro in Chicago, has gone to Kansas City to take charge of the Metro branch in that city. F. M. Brockwell, formerly with the Famous Players, has taken Mr. Proctor's place.

J. A. Steinson, who for the past eight months has covered parts of Texas and Oklahoma for the Dallas Vitagraph-V. L. S. E. office, has just been made resident manager of the Vitagraph-V. S. L. E. exchange in New Orleans.

Guy L. Wonders, manager of the Wilson Theater, Baltimore, Maryland, was appointed a member of the Committee on Fire Prevention Regulations and Insurance of the National Association of the Motion Picture Industry.

The Greater Vitagraph Company has installed a piano in its projection room at 1600 Broadway and provided a musician to get the melody out of it with the idea of making things congenial for the trade paper critics who review its productions.

Four reels of film, entitled "Fighting with the Allies," were stolen from the offices of the Wolverine Film Company of Detroit last week. Efforts to trace the feature have failed and any copy of the picture offered for rental or sale is done so illegitimately.

The Marigold room of the Bismarck Gardens, Chicago, which recently installed a picture screen, has of late been creating a lot of interest in a local civic film, "A Tale of One City," which reveals Chicago's problems and the ways in which they can be solved.

It is reported that A. H. Woods will in the near future begin the construction of a new "legitimate" house in Chicago's downtown district. It is expected that the new theater will seat about 1,600 and will represent an investment of more than a million dollars.

Thirty proprietors of neighborhood theaters in Detroit, Michigan, are making arrangements to form an association of neighborhood managers and owners with a view to getting together occasionally and talking over matters that directly concern outskirt theaters.

Thomas Smith, adopted son of Capt. John Smith, the oldest Indian in the United States, purchased a motion picture outfit from W. R. Vincent, manager of the Lyric Theater, Cass Lake, Minnesota, and will take the outfit to Bena, where he will open a motion picture theater.

For two years the Ohio board of censors has refused to permit the film "Hypocrites" to be shown in the state because of the nude figure of "Truth" and some religious subjects which were objectionable. This film has changed hands and has been cut so that it has recently been passed by the censors.

Pittsburgh, Pa. (Special).—Manager Harry Davis of the Grand Opera House has adopted the European custom of naming the proscenium boxes for stage celebrities, and has invited the patrons of his house to vote for their favorite film stars, the six winners to be afterward honored in this manner.

The latest film publication to make its appearance is The Screamer, a live little eight-page sheet issued every Saturday by the "Scream Club" in Los Angeles. Clarke Irvine is the father, editor and bill-payer. The price of the paper is announced as "1 boost." The mailing fee is one dollar per year.

Downtown Chicago theaters are running the following bills for the week of November 6: La Salle, Mary Pickford in "Less Than the Dust;" Band Box, "The Unborn;" Studebaker, "20,000 Leagues Under the Sea;" Castle, Mary Pickford in "Hearts Adrift;" Colonial, "The Birth of a Nation;" Ziegfeld, "The Last Man."

By Aerial Mail Service, Chicago to New York via New York Times aeroplane, came to Mary Pickford a prediction that her new Artcraft picture, "Less Than the Dust," would be the biggest winner of the season. This greeting came from Jones, Linick and Shaefer's La Salle Theater, where the play is booked for two weeks.

In an address before three thousand delegates to the national convention of the Diciples of Christ held in Des Moines, Reverend Charles M. Fillmore of Indianapolis recommended the use of motion pictures in Sunday schools, to prevent the children seeing undesirable films at theaters and to induce larger attendance at the church schools.

A new motion picture theater will result from the remodeling of the old Isis Theater in Salt Lake City, Utah, according to announcement made October 18. It will be known as the Deseret Picture House. It will cost $68,000 and have a seating capacity of 1,000. The officers of the management are H. S. Sims, president; H. S. Auerbach, vice-president, and Levi N. Harmon, secretary-treasurer.

Willimantic, Conn. reports that Frank Kattelinia, of Fall River, Mass., has leased the entire building on Main street containing the Bijou Motion Picture Theater and will open it soon under the name of the "Star" with the name theater dropped out. The Bijou has been closed for several months. Extensive alterations have been made in the exterior and interior of the house.

Senor Carlos Castro Ruiz, the Chilean consul general, presented to S. L. Rothapfel, manager of the Rialto Theater, New York, six reels of motion pictures, which give an illuminating and entertaining idea of Chilean scenery, industries, cities and people. Manager Rothapfel is selecting and rearranging the pictures and will exhibit them at the first opportunity.

The Strand Theater, New York, is showing Mary Pickford in "Less Than the Dust," and Ditmar's "Living Book of Nature." On the musical program are Grace Hoffman, soprano, and Jan Rubini, violinist. The concert orchestra, under the direction of Carl Edouarde, will play an operatic overture and also incidental music appropriate to the subjects shown on the screen.

William Koenig, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of the Northwest, requested the city council license committee to grant no more licenses for motion picture theaters in Minneapolis as the theaters now cover the city well and more of them in certain districts will work a hardship on those already there. The council refused to grant any of the applications for licenses or for transfers in compliance with his request.

Owing to the increased cost in running the picture houses in San Francisco it is very probable that admission prices will be raised generally throughout the downtown sections. The present prices in the better houses are ten and twenty cents. There are but very few nickel houses in the city. The St. Francis Theater has already increased its prices to fifteen and twenty-five cents, the prices in vogue in the best houses in Los Angeles and many other cities.

With Greece figuring so much in the headlines of the newspapers, Burton Holmes' travel picture for the Paramount is timely. This is the fortieth of the weekly trips around the world. Some of the features of the trip are a visit to the ancient Eleusis, a glimpse of Grecian peasants dancing, a ride through the Corinthian Canal, views of Athens with the king's palace, the public square, the Acropolis with the ruins of the Parthenon, and pictures of the late King Edward of England and King George of Greece leaving the English church in Athens.

There are various opinions amongst exhibitors in England as to the value of certain forms of advertisements, but the majority pin their faith to a big display of window-bills. There are some who look upon the expenditure of an advertisement in the local press as a doubtful investment. The result of this form of advertising is not always easy to trace, but it is being forcibly driven home to most exhibitors that those houses freely using the newspapers in conjunction with a good poster display are the people kept busiest at the pay-box.

All the Mazamas living in New York are expected to attend The Rialto this week. A Mazama (Mexican for mountain goat) is a person who belongs to the club of that name and in order to be eligible for membership he has to have climbed to the summit of a mountain boasting at least one living glacier. At the club's annual encampment in August this year the club members were photographed by Robert C. Bruce, as part of the series of motion pictures he took in the Three Sisters country of the Cascades, 6,200 feet up. The picture is a marvel of scenic beauty and is presented as one of the features on the bill at The Rialto, under the title of "The Mazamas and the Three Sisters."

Smith Lord, the English exhibitor who is noted over there for his advertising catch lines, is now using the following:

The only two articles necessary to show good pictures are "willingness" and "capability"—and we at Cross Lane keep a big stock of both.

You are forbidden to read this bill—unless you are prepared to pay the penalty, viz., the price of a seat for yourself and friend.

We shall blot out this week's bill with the next, but we cannot blot out the memory of the good things we are showing—nor do we want to.

The quantity of leading men and women living in Horton is wonderful; you can see them leading their friends to Cross Lane Picture Palace for an evening's enjoyment, such as they themselves are used to.

The chief attraction on the Rialto program for the week is Douglas Fairbanks in "American Aristocracy." The Rialto Orchsetra, under the direction of Hugo Riesenfeld, will render the overture to "William Tell," with elaborate light effects specially devised by Mr. Rothapfel. As a separate orchestral number, enhanced by scenic embellishment and a color harmonies, the Intermezzo and the Barcarole from "The Tales of Hoffman" will be offered. Hans Kronold, the cellist, will be the individual star of the musical programme. Hilda Goodwin will sing an aria from "Romeo and Juliet." The educational feature will be a selected scenic and Mr. Rothapfel will provide his usual distinctive accompaniment to the topical digest, edited from a variety of sources. A Keystone comedy will complete the program.

Central Film Enlarges Force

Although he recently enlarged his offices Harry Weiss, general manager of the Central Film Corporation, finds that he will need still larger quarters to handle Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin and Kentucky on the Clara Kimball Young Productions, released under the Selznick banner. Out of four hundred fifty-five theaters in Chicago one hundred sixty-seven are showing Mr. Weiss' productions.

Mr. Weiss has made the following changes and additions to his force. Sidney J. Goldman, roadman, has been made special representative. William Weiss takes Mr. Goldman's place on the sales force handling Indiana and Kentucky territory. Phil Dunas is handling Wisconsin and Illinois. Mae Holzman and Lillian Simon have been added to the inspection department and William Hackett as night shipper. Earl Tuch and A. Larson have been added to auditing department. A twenty-four hour service has been inaugurated, giving the exhibitor day and night service.

A five-reel feature photoplay starring Ruth Stonehouse has been commenced at Universal City by Director Raymond Wells.

Captain Leslie T. Peacocke has under production at Universal City "The Vegetarian" in one reel, with Eileen Sedgwick, Eugene Walsh, Al McKinnon and Viola Lind in the cast.

Make the League Represent All the Exhibitors

MOST exhibitors agree that organization is a necessity. Theoretically they like the idea of an exhibitors' association. Practically, when they have one, they don't join it—at least not in very encouraging numbers.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is popularly supposed to represent the will of the exhibitors of this country. The tasks it undertakes are assumed to bear the stamp of approval of the exhibitors as an industrial unit. And that assumption is justified by the fact that no exhibitor is barred from membership except for some extraordinary reason. They are all welcome. The League was made for them. It should have ninety per cent of them as its members. The distressing fact is that it has but five per cent of them.

The total membership of the League is less than seven hundred and fifty. That is one member for every twenty motion picture theaters. When the League expresses an opinion or takes action in any direction as the official voice of the combined exhibitors of America, every one of its members carries the burden of twenty men. The fact that the other nineteen might not approve of the measure does not signify, for the nineteen are not members and the one is.

That fifteen thousand motion picture theater men should be willing to let themselves be impersonated by one-twentieth of their number is deplorable. And that is exactly what happens when a big industry is represented by a small membership in its association. The things the League says are bound to be hailed as the utterances of the entire exhibiting body. The things the League does are bound to be regarded as "of, for and by the motion picture exhibitor."

This condition is not the fault of the League, or of any of its officers, or of any of its members. It is the fault of the non-members; of those fourteen thousand odd exhibitors who are too indifferent to the unification of their power to get together, even when the way is made clear for them.

It is common to hear the non-member of an association declare "I will not join because I don't like the way they run things. When they change their ways I will come in." The protest is so familiar we seldom stop to think how illogical it is. The members of an association are really the ones who "run things." They appoint directors and officers who will conduct affairs as they want them conducted. Staying out of an association never made it change its ways to suit the one who stayed out, and never will. The only possible way to get improvement is to get inside and fight for it. The man on the outside has no right even to ask for a change of methods.

Yet the man outside the association, the non-member, cannot shirk his responsibility or avoid the consequences of his indifference. He is assumed to stand behind everything the League says and does. The League speaks and acts for him, since he is unable to speak and act for himself. He may not agree with it, but he is powerless to say so. As a non-member he is a nonentity. He is merely one of the fifteen thousand that constitute "the voice of the exhibitor." And that voice is expressed by five per cent of its strength, which assumes authority to speak for the other ninety-five per cent.

What kind of a government would we have in this country if only one million voters instead of over twenty million were allowed to express their choice? The case is more nearly parallel than the casual observer may think; for the exhibitors' association is assumed by most people to represent all the exhibitors. Under that assumption the actual members of the association gain power; the non-members lose.

There is nothing wrong with the League. It is a good organization, equipped to do excellent work. With a membership big enough to express the real sentiments of the exhibiting body, to get the approval of a consequential number of exhibitors for its activities instead of a mere handful, it would accomplish wonders.

The whole industry needs a stronger League. The exhibitors who are not members need it most of all. It is to them that we appeal for an effort to make the present association—which is as good as any that could be organized—represent a majority of the exhibiting end of this business.

Every motion picture theater man ought to join the League and help to run it the way he thinks it should be run. As a member he can protest the things he does not like, and vote for the people he does like. As a non-member he can do neither, but must permit the weight of his profession to be used in any manner the actual members see fit to use it.

The National Association's organization work will be completed shortly, and the officers and committees of the Association will have some time which can well be given to the assistance of the League. "Class 2" is bound to be the most difficult division of the Association, so far as securing members is concerned. The exhibitors are not only slower to appreciate the benefits of organization than the other classes, but they are inclined to suspect the sincerity of those who take active part in such work. Therefore we are sure the League organizers would welcome the assistance of the whole Association in converting that five per cent membership into ninety-five per cent.

Motography Announces a Projection Department

E. C. SCOBEY, secretary-treasurer of Motion Picture Machine Operator's Local No. 194, I. A. T. S. E., and formerly associated with the Central Film Service Company at Indianapolis, Ind., has joined MOTOGRAPHY'S editorial staff as conductor of a department for projecting machine operators. Mr. Scobey is known personally to such a large proportion of the operators in this country that it is unnecessary to emphasize the fact that he is peculiarly fitted for the editing of such a department. It is sufficient to say that with the help of the publishers he will endeavor to make it the best Projection Department ever offered to the operators.

A department of this nature, however earnest and hardworking its editor may be, cannot reach its full usefulness without the co-operation of the operators for whom it is intended. Co-operation, in this case, merely means asking questions and discussing problems. The more questions the operators send in, and the more difficult the problems they discuss, the better Mr. Scobey and MOTOGRAPHY will like it.

Mr. Scobey, in accepting charge of the new department, expressed the opinion that his friends, reading this announcement, would probably take fiendish delight in flooding him with their hardest and most unsolvable problems, just to see him "get stuck." Privately, we hope they will do just that. We don't believe it is possible to "stick" him on any reasonable question. If they can make the Projection Department look like an examination for a post-graduate degree, they are welcome, we're sure.

MOTOGRAPHY'S Projection Department will first appear in the issue dated December 2, which goes to press November 21. Therefore, all questions to which answers are desired in that issue should be sent in as soon as possible. All communications for the Projection Department may be addressed simply to Motography, Chicago, Ill. All questions will be answered in the earliest possible issue subsequent to their receipt.

Frank Borzage is an Arizona gunman in "Immediate Lee," and Anna Little plays opposite him as a snappy little dance hall girl. This new American-Mutual is one of the topliners for the week of November 7.

New Kolb and Dill Comedy

ANNA LITTLE AND FRANK BORZAGE IN FIVE-REEL FEATURE

THE American studios come to the fore in the Mutual schedule for the week of November 7 and furnish as headliners the comedians Max M. Dill and William C. Kolb, and Frank Borzage and Anna Little in five-part features.

Kolb and Dill, who were noted on the speaking stage before their debut in motion pictures under the Mutual banner will appear in a five-reel Mutual Star Production, "A Peck O' Pickles." This vehicle served the comedy duo in their most recent appearance on the stage. This is the fourth Kolb and Dill production filmed by the Mutual Company. It was directed by T. N. Heffron.

The story opens in a camp in the Civil War days of 1860. Into the camp come Mike and Louie (Kolb and Dill) with their million-dollar lottery winnings. They are suspected as spies and are set on picket duty. They find that the muskets interfere with their walking, so discard them. They are then placed on the firing line and to keep them from running away the captain has a target painted on their backs. The comedians see a way out of this difficulty, however, and leave back to back. Mike and Louie are then transported in their dreams to the year of 1960. Here they meet with many surprises and you may be assured that the things they see do not surprise them any more than they will those who see the production.

The supporting cast in "A Peck O' Pickles" includes May Cloy, Josephine Clark, Marie Van Tassel, Burdell Jacobs and Frank Thompson. There are also several companies of U. S. coast artillery men in the battle scenes.

Frank Borzage and Anna Little are starred in the five-reel Mutual Masterpicture "Immediate Lee." Both Borzage and Anna Little have won laurels for their splendid portrayals of western characters. Borzage directed his newest picture.

One of the notable characters appearing in "Immediate Lee" is Old Jim, "Big Bill" Russell's Chinese cook. He has proved himself to be a true comedian, in the part of the cook for the cowboy's camp.

Frank Borzage is cast as "Immediate Lee," noted as a terrible gunman of Arizona. In the cow country the terror of the country meets a beautiful dance hall girl and falls in love with her. After a typical western courtship he wins her consent and they have a "genteel wedding," in fact so genteel that one of the guests who is caught chewing tobacco, swallows it, while another one sticks his in his boot.

Among the noteworthy scenes in this production are the big western dance hall, turned into a church for the marriage of "Immediate Lee" and his dance hall sweetheart, great stockyard scenes and the vast Arizona ranch.

Jack Richardson, noted for his "villainy" is the heavy villain. Others in the cast are William Stowell and "Chick" Morrison.

A two-reel Mutual drama, "The Turn of the Wheel," will be released on Monday, November 6th. This is a story of love and the "eternal triangle." It is of the "sure fire" type.

The second release of "Tours Around the World" from Gaumont, is scheduled for Tuesday of this week and there are many beautiful bits of scenics shown in it. The cameraman succeeded in getting some of the best pictures of battle scarred countries ever filmed. One of the notable characteristics of this scenic is that there are scenes of the historical spots in Europe shown, which have since been destroyed and these pictures are all that is left to show what was once a beautiful city or the centuries old buildings destroyed.

A four-reel Film D'Art production, chock full of thrilling romance and splendid emotional characterizations by the well chosen cast, will be released on Thursday.

"Her Sun Kissed Hero," a one-reel Cub Comedy, featuring Neal Burns and Betty Compson, is the mirth provoker scheduled for Friday. This is a clever production and Burns, as the love sick youth, and Betty Compson, as the cause of his illness, do some very satisfying work.

Edna Payne and Norbert Myles are cast in the leading role of the two-reel production, "The Bad Samaritan," to be released on Saturday.

The Mutual Weekly, which secured scenes of all important events happening the world over, "See America First," the beautiful scenic, on the same reel with Kartoon Komics and Reel Life, the one-reel magazine film are all "up to the minute."

Paddy McGuire, that bungling, stumbling, but far from grumbling comedian, supported by the regular comedy cast, including Arthur Moon, Gypsy Abbott, the versatile dark-haired comedienne, and Margaret Templeton, are cast in the two-reel Vogue comedy, "Lost, Strayed or Stolen," to be released on Sunday.

Paddy McGuire takes the part of the new butler, Arthur Moon is the broker and Gypsy Abbott is happily cast as the receiver of the thousand-dollar note, or the broker's wife.

"WAR BRIDES" OPENS BROADWAY

First Production of Brenon Film Corporation Released by Selznick to Open on November 12

Following the announcement that Lewis J. Selznick, Carl Laemmle and Herbert Brenon have taken a long term lease of the Broadway Theater, New York City, changed the policy of the house and will present only big features at advanced prices for the future, comes the announcement that "War Brides" will be given its initial presentation at the Broadway Theater on November 12.

"War Brides," Brenon's first production for Selznick-Pictures with Nazimova making her first appearance on the screen, is also the first photodrama Brenon ever has made in which he was absolutely free to carry out his own ideas from beginning to end. Being president of the Herbert Brenon Film Corporation, he allows Director Herbert Brenon to do just about as he pleases, and this harmonious association of employer and employe has resulted in the production of a photodrama which will surpass anything he ever has done in the past.

"War Brides" marks a distinct climax in Brenon's career, which may be divided into three sections. His first successes can be classified as photodramas of plot. Two other of his biggest directorial efforts, "Neptune's Daughter" and "A Daughter of the Gods," displayed a desire to reach out beyond the mere story and indulge in fanciful ideas with spectacular settings.

In "War Brides" he has created distinctly a photodrama of emotion, and has eliminated all spectacles except those which are necessary to drive home the story.

"War Brides" will introduce Nazimova to the screen in the same role in which she made her greatest stage success. The scenario was based upon Marion Craig Wentworth's play. One of the unique features of the production is that it is a play about war without showing battles. It deals with the background of war and not with the fighting front. Yet, while not pretending to be a portrayal of conflict, one scene was built for this production which probably surpasses anything done on this continent to show actual war conditions. This was a huge trench, four stories deep, in which the life of the soldiers is shown, and the sudden and unexpected manner in which whole companies may be killed without even seeing the enemy.

Nazimova as Joan, the widow of a young officer, and Gertrude Berkeley as the officer's mother, have two roles which for emotional intensity probably never have been equaled on the screen.

TWO YEARS FOR MOROSCO

November Ninth Marks Second Anniversary—Has Helped Materially in Advancement of Industry

The Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company reached its second anniversary on November 9. Two years is not a long time to become established as one of the most important factors in such a gigantic industry but from its inception in the motion picture industry this company took its place in the first rank of feature producers and today the name of Morosco in motion pictures holds the same prominent position for quality and progressiveness as it does in the theatrical world.

The Oliver Morosco Company has been responsible for making possible the appearances on the screen of many internationally famous stars of the stage and has established many new ideas in the way of novel effects, settings and studio stagecraft. In the west coast plant productions are staged with a thoroughness rarely noticeable elsewhere. It is the company's policy to insist upon exact reproductions both as to sets and furnishings, of the things they portray.

Among the most prominent stars who have been presented on the screen by the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company are Anna Held, Lenore Ulrich, George Beban, Kathlyn Williams, Myrtle Stedman, Fritzi Scheff, Rita Jolivet, Vivian Martin, Constance Collier, Lois Meredith, Elsie Janis, George Fawcett, Cyril Maude, Blanche Ring, Charlotte Greenwood, Sydney Grant, and others of equal fame. Among its releases are included such well known successes as "Pasquale," "The Heart of Paula," "Peer Gynt," "Kilmeny," "Help Wanted," "The Tongues of Men,' and "The Code of Marcia Gray." As a result of such plays on the screen the paraphrase, "a typical Morosco cast," achieved in the "legit" has also become current in speaking of Morosco photoplays.

The election of Cecil B. DeMille to the presidency of the Oliver Morosco Photoplay Company, as announced recently, speaks well for the further advancement of this brand of screen plays as well as the industry in general. Mr. DeMille, one of the four organizers of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, has evidenced on the screen since the inception of that company, the fact that he is a master of photoplay production. That the future output of the Morosco studios will be unexcelled is unquestioned.
